1.0 Introduction

1.1 Context

In the late 1950s, the Australian Publicity Council issued a glossy publication entitled Spotlight on Australia, which observed that, while it was the second smallest state in the Commonwealth, Victoria produced one third of its wealth. Its area of 88,000 square miles (almost 23 million hectares) was described as “the most intensively developed in the Commonwealth”, which produced 20% of the country’s wool, 40% of its dairy produce and 50% of its root vegetables.<sup>1</sup> Its capital city, Melbourne, was also cited as “the financial centre of the country”. The following quote from the Victorian Year Book provides a succinct summary of Melbourne’s status in the immediate post-war period:

Between 1947 and 1954, Melbourne’s population rose from almost 1.25 million to over 1.5 million, its motor registrations trebled and its industrial development had risen to more than a quarter of the Australian total. The problem of overall planning for the metropolitan area could no longer be ignored, and the Board of Works undertook the task. The preservation of the green belt, the development of suburban business centres and the provision of adequate highways were major objectives.<sup>2</sup>

Not only would the city’s population double between 1947 and 1971, but it would also undergo unprecedented transformation.<sup>3</sup> As Graeme Davison has noted

Between 1950 and 1970, Melbourne became – for the first time since the 1880s – the fastest growing city in Australia. Perhaps more than any other Australian city, it exemplified the Fordist paradigm of urban growth – high investment in manufacturing, especially of protected consumer products such as cars and electrical goods, high levels of immigration, high levels of car and home ownership and high levels of government intervention in the provision of infrastructure. Melbourne became the main beach-head of American economic and cultural influence, and the leading centre of modernist innovation in art, architecture and design.<sup>4</sup>

1.2 Project Brief

This study was commissioned by Heritage Victoria in April 2008 to identify built places across Victoria from the post-Second World War (hereafter referred to simply as “post-war”) period that were considered to be of potential heritage significance at a state level.

The study was to cover the entire period from 1945 to 2000, although the brief stated that the emphasis would be on the first thirty years. Certain types of buildings (see omissions, Section 3.5) were not to be included in the study, as they had been subject to separate typological studies.

The study was to comprise two parts as follows:

Contextual overview

A historical and architectural framework for development in Victoria during the post-war period, based on Victoria’s Framework of Historic Themes. (see Section 2.0)

Identification of Places

Identification and preliminary assessment of places of potential state significance (see Section 3.0);

2.0 Contextual Overview

The contextual overview in this report has been shaped around the Victorian Framework of Historic Themes, which is reproduced below in its entirety. It must be noted that not all of these themes were considered to have particular pertinence to the state's post-war development, and those themes that have been earmarked for further discussion are indicated in bold.

1. Shaping Victoria's environment
  - 1.1 Tracing climate and topographical change
  - 1.2 Tracing the emergence of Victoria's plants and animals
  - 1.3 Understanding scientifically diverse environments
  - 1.4 Creation stories and defining country
  - 1.5 Exploring, surveying and mapping
  - 1.6 Living with natural processes
  - 1.7 Appreciating and protecting Victoria's natural wonders
2. Peopling Victoria's places and landscapes
  - 2.1 Living as Victoria's original inhabitants
  - 2.2 Adapting to diverse environments
  - 2.3 Arriving in a new land
  - 2.4 Migrating and making a home
  - 2.5 Maintaining distinctive cultures
  - 2.6 Promoting settlement
  - 2.7 Fighting for identity
3. Connecting Victorians by transport and communications
  - 3.1 Establishing pathways
  - 3.2 Travelling by water
  - 3.3 Linking Victorians by rail
  - 3.4 Linking Victorians by road in the twentieth century
  - 3.5 Travelling by tram
  - 3.6 Linking Victorians by air
  - 3.7 Establishing and maintaining communications
4. Transforming the land
  - 4.1 Living off the land
  - 4.2 Living from the sea
  - 4.3 Grazing and raising livestock
  - 4.4 Farming
  - 4.5 Gold mining
  - 4.6 Exploiting other mineral, forest and water resources
  - 4.7 Transforming the land and waterways

5. Building Victoria's industries and workforce

5.1 Processing raw materials

5.2 Developing a manufacturing capacity

5.3 Marketing and retailing

5.4 Exhibiting Victoria's innovation and products

5.5 Banking and finance

5.6 Entertaining and socialising

5.7 Working

6. Building towns, cities and the garden state

6.1 Establishing Melbourne Town, Port Phillip District

6.2 Creating Melbourne

6.3 Shaping the suburbs

6.4 Making regional centres

6.5 Living in country towns

6.6 Marking significant phases in development of Victoria's settlements, towns and cities

6.7 Making homes for Victorians

6.8 Living on the fringes

7. Governing Victorians

7.1 Developing institutions of self-government and democracy

7.2 Struggling for political rights

7.3 Maintaining law and order

7.4 Defending Victoria and Australia

7.5 Protecting Victoria's heritage

8. Building community life

8.1 Maintaining spiritual life

8.2 Educating people

8.3 Providing health and welfare services

8.4 Forming community organisations

8.5 Preserving traditions and commemorating

8.6 Marking the phases of life

9. Shaping cultural and creative life

9.1 Participating in sport and recreation

9.2 Nurturing a vibrant arts scene

9.3 Achieving distinction in the arts

9.4 Creating popular culture

9.5 Advancing knowledge in science and technology

2.0 Peopling Victoria's Places and Landscapes

2.4 Migrating and making a home

Hoping to preserve British-Australian culture in the face of possible invasion, the Labor Government unveiled an immigration scheme in 1945 that offered subsidised or free passage to British nationals.<sup>5</sup> Two years later, the program was revised (after an agreement with the International Refugee Organisation) to include migrants from continental Europe. An Australia-wide migration boom followed, although more than half of those that had arrived by the late 1950s settled in Victoria.<sup>6</sup>

The first outward sign of migrant presence were the Commonwealth hostels, with rows of Nissen and Quonset huts that remained a distinctive (and maligned) presence for two decades. The first, north of the Exhibition Buildings, opened in late 1949 and was followed by others, typically located in less desirable outer or industrial suburbs such as Altona, Brooklyn, Fisherman's Bend and Maribyrnong. The camps were subject to little maintenance until the mid-1960s, when the Commonwealth initiated a national scheme to consolidate and upgrade them. All of the Victorian hostels were closed, save for three (at Nunawading, Maribyrnong and Altona) slated for redevelopment with new purpose-built flats, plus a fourth to be built from scratch at Springvale. These four hostels remained in use until the late 1980s, although, with the cessation of the British migrant program in 1976, the nationality of the average migrant changed from European to south-east Asian and, later, African.

Leaving the hostels behind, a migrant family typically settled either in the vicinity of the hostel itself (where, in some cases, an estate may have been developed by the Housing Commission of Victoria) or in a suburb traditionally associated with their particular ethnicity, nationality or cultural group. Both tendencies have created identifiable precincts in the suburbs that, to this day, remain strongly associated with their respective migrant cultures. For example:

- Mediterranean (Carlton and Brunswick in the north; Keilor and Avondale Heights to the north-east, Bulleen and Templestowe to the outer east);
- Eastern European (south-eastern suburbs including Caulfield, Balaclava and Brighton East);
- South-east Asian (Footscray, Springvale, Mitcham and Nunawading);
- Middle Eastern (northern suburbs such as Brunswick, Coburg and Preston);
- German (Mitcham and Ringwood);
- South African (Templestowe);

2.5 Maintaining Distinctive Cultures

In Victoria, migrants have maintained their distinctive cultures through events such as festivals, art exhibitions and music and dramatic performances. Few of these, however, have left a lasting mark on the state's built environment. A migrant family's own home, of course, typically reflected its cultural background – not merely in terms of furnishing or landscaping, but also in its streetscape presence. The phenomenon of existing houses transformed by Mediterranean emigres with wrought iron, terrazzo and concrete balustrading is well documented. However, purpose-built houses have also expressive distinctive cultures, from the portico'd mansions of wealthy Italian and Greek businessmen in Templestowe and Avondale Heights to the octagonal-planned and other feng shui-flavoured dwellings favoured by Asian migrants in Doncaster and Glen Waverley.

Migrant settlement in such parts of Melbourne has produced a “ripple effect”, whereby various commercial, retail and community facilities have sprung up in a desire to further maintain distinctive cultures. This, in many cases, has transformed large areas or even entire suburbs into strongly identifiable cultural precincts. This has been manifest in various ways:

- Restaurants. A book published by the Commonwealth in the early 1960s remarked that the influx of post-war immigrants had given rise to “a swarm of bistros, barbecues, espresso cafes, salami bars and smorgasbord tables” across the entire country.<sup>7</sup> Leo’s Spaghetti Bar in St Kilda (1955) has been cited as one of the first Italian restaurants in Melbourne, while Pizza Napoli in Russell Street, established by the Ursini brothers in 1967, still claims the title of the city’s first pizza outlet.<sup>8</sup> The French émigré artist Mirka Mora also established a succession of French bistros during this period: the Mirka Cafe in Exhibition Street (1954), the Bistrot Balzac in East Melbourne (1958), and lastly the Tolarno in St Kilda (1965).<sup>9</sup> The latter suburb was also home to the Café Scheherezade, a much-loved but sadly recently-closed institution operated by the Zeleznikow family from 1958.<sup>10</sup>
- Grocery stores and specialist retail outlets. From the mid-1940s, grocers in Lygon Street began to stock items such as olive oil, while the next decade saw the appearance of specialist retailers (such as the Greek food store operated by the Pitsilidis family in Little Lonsdale Street) and manufacturers (such as the Italiano Perfect Cheese Company).<sup>11</sup> A small grocery shop opened by the Piedemonte family in Fitzroy in 1958 expanded into a specialist supermarket during the 1960s, while another subsequently opened in Sydney Road, Coburg, in the late 1970s. Asian grocery stores, once found only in Melbourne’s Chinatown, spread to migrant hotspots such as Footscray, Springvale, Box Hill and Mitcham and can now be found elsewhere, while European delis and cake-shops proliferated in the Jewish heartland of Balaclava and Caulfield. More recent developments include a Dutch food shop in Vermont South and a small South African supermarket in Templestowe.
- Places of Worship. Before the Second World War, synagogues and Orthodox Protestant churches existed in only very small numbers in Victoria, but both have undergone a massive boom since the late 1940s. Two decades later, as the nationalities of migrants has changed, hitherto unrepresented places of worship have appeared including mosques, and temples for Hindus, Buddhists and Sikhs.
- Social and community facilities. The Italian community is particularly known to its network of social clubs, such as the Abruzzo Club in Brunswick East (1967) and the Veneto Club in Bulleen (1973). Melbourne’s Jewish community is also particularly well established with a network of dedicated community facilities, from community centres (eg Beth Weizmann Centre) and welfare organisations (B’nai Brith) to specialised funeral services (Chevrah Kadisha).
- Businesses in native languages. Medical clinics, legal practices and other commercial ventures have also thrived in these areas, invariably advertising in languages other than English. Newspapers in languages other than English (such as Italian, Chinese, Greek) have also become available.
- Educational facilities. Religious schools associated with burgeoning migrant presence have included King Khalid College in Coburg (Islamic) and Mount Scopus Memorial College in Burwood (Jewish).

It is telling that many of the new buildings associated with aspects of migrant culture were the work of architects who were themselves migrants. These émigré designers – who brought with them new experiences and influences – have not only maintained distinctive cultures but also had a profound influence on the local architectural scene. The following list, linking a number of prominent migrant architects with their countries of origin, serves to underscore the extent of this influence:

3.0 Connecting Victorians by transport and communications

3.2 Travelling by Water

The post-war period saw Melbourne's passenger shipping terminal at Station Pier serve as the first point of contact for thousands of migrants. The facility had been somewhat neglected during the War, and, in anticipation of more arrivals, the Melbourne Harbour Trust proposed a massive upgrade program. The first stage, comprising an extension to the outer concourse, was completed in 1952, and further works (including the provision of new baggage and customs areas) were undertaken in anticipation of the Olympic Games in 1956.<sup>12</sup> Nine years later, the outer terminal was substantially renovated to create a new International Terminal, with cafeteria, waiting hall and modern telephone and postal facilities.

Passenger shipping into and out of Victoria began to decline from the early 1970s due to the increased popularity (and affordability) of air travel. By that time, even half of the country's assisted migrants were arriving by plane. After a dormant period, Station Pier became the terminal for the new trans-Tasman ferry service in 1985.

Maritime trade in Victoria otherwise boomed during the post-war period. The regional centre of Portland, which remains as the only deep sea port between Port Phillip Bay and Adelaide, underwent a massive upgrade from 1949, with the construction of new bulk storage and improved road and railway infrastructure.<sup>13</sup> The Port of Melbourne – still Australia's largest general cargo port – was similarly transformed through several innovations during the 1960s. The introduction of roll-on and roll-off cargo loading in 1959 was soon followed by containerised shipping – first used for Western Australian trade in 1964, and for international trade in 1969.<sup>14</sup>

3.4 Linking Victorians by road in the twentieth century

Victoria's emergence as a car-oriented society really began in 1945, when General Motors-Holden (GMH) responded to the federal government's invitation to develop "Australia's own car". In 1948, the first locally-made vehicle rolled off the assembly line at the GMH factory at Fishermen's Bend and, two years later, the incoming Liberal government abolished petrol rationing.<sup>15</sup>

Between 1947 and 1954, the number of motor registrations in Melbourne trebled.<sup>16</sup> Car manufacture boomed, with GMH opening a new factory at Dandenong (1956) and a proving ground at Lang Lang (1957), while other factories were established by rivals Ford (1956) at Broadmeadows and Volkswagen (1959) at Westall. The repercussions of this increasing reliance on private motor transport were broad and far-reaching, and included the following:

- A boom of new petrol stations, albeit transformed from the old-style independent motor garage into the modern American-style single-branded “service station”;
- The introduction of new traffic control systems, including parking meters (1955) and hook turns in central Melbourne (1958) and modern three-lantern illuminated traffic lights (early 1960s);
- The upgrading of road networks to the point that, by the late 1950s, Victoria could be described as a haven for motorists with “well-made roads that penetrate every corner of the state”.<sup>17</sup>
- The successive introduction of new car-orientated building types from the early 1950s. Victoria’s first drive-in bank opened at Camberwell in 1954, followed by the first drive-in cinema (at Burwood) in 1955, the first drive-in bottle shop (at the Brighton Club Hotel) in 1957, and the first modern motel (at Oakleigh), also in 1957.
- The introduction of freeways, initially proposed in the 1954 MMBW metropolitan planning scheme. The two earliest examples –the Maltby Bypass and the first portion of the Southern Freeway (between Punt Road and MacRobertson’s Bridge) opened in 1962. These were duly followed by the second stage of the Southeastern Freeway (1965-69), the West Gate Freeway (1968-71), the Tullamarine Freeway (1968), the Mulgrave Freeway (1970-73) and the Eastern Freeway (1971-77).<sup>18</sup>
- The completion, after much planning and a partial collapse, of the West Gate Bridge (1971-78)

Since the 1970s, Victoria’s road network has successively improved by the extension of freeways and by the introduction of new technology such as computer-controlled traffic signals (1979), red light cameras (1983) and speed cameras (1985).<sup>19</sup> This same period also witnessed the decline or obsolescence of some of the car-oriented developments of previous decades (such as the drive-in bank and the drive-in cinema) as well as the emergence of new ones (such as the drive-through car wash and drive-in service at fast food restaurants).

3.6 Linking Victorians by air

Victoria’s original government aerodrome opened at Essendon in 1921, but commercial aviation remained a novelty until two major private airlines – Ansett and Australian National Airways – were formed in Melbourne in 1937.<sup>20</sup> Hangars and a large modern terminal were built at Essendon and, in anticipation of future expansion, the boundaries of the site were increased in 1939 and again in 1942. The economics of domestic air travel were further improved immediately after the War by the formation of the government’s own airline, Trans Australian Airlines (TAA). That same year, a scheme was unveiled to erect three new runways. Within a few short years, air traffic increased to the point that the aerodrome could be described as the busiest in Australia, and one of the busiest in the Commonwealth. The availability of ex servicemen pilots also contributed to the boom in world aviation in this period.

The 1949 announcement that Melbourne would host the XVI Olympic Games necessitated further improvement of the Essendon Aerodrome, which was promptly upgraded to the status of an International Airport a year later. New infrastructure completed by 1956 included a control tower, two new hangars for ANA and a passenger lounge for TAA. Although a fine purpose-built International Terminal had been mooted, this was not completed in time for the Games and did not open until 1959.

By that time, domestic air travel was dominated by the duopoly of TAA and Ansett – the latter having merged with ANA in 1957. Each airline maintained its national headquarters in Melbourne, with a precinct of airline-related buildings developing on the city's edge, between Franklin and Victoria streets. Over the following decades, both airlines expanded their physical presence with a range of maintenance, training and administrative facilities at the airport and elsewhere. Each airline had its preferred architectural firm – the office of Harry Norris undertook most work for TAA, while Ansett invariably turned to Seabrook, Hunt & Dale.

By the late 1950s, it was apparent that jet aircraft represented the future of air travel. Essendon's runways, however, were too short for most jet aircraft, and further expansion was no longer an option. Ironically, the opening of the new International Terminal in 1959 coincided with an announcement that the government would build a new and larger airport further north, at Tullamarine. Although expected to open within five years, it was not ready for occupation until 1970. The massive complex included three terminals – one each for rivals TAA and Ansett and another shared by six international airlines. Subsidiary facilities sprung up on the airport's outskirts, including a multi-storey American-style motel (Best Overend, 1971) and the Astrojet Centre (Kurt Popper, 1971) for the training of airline crew. The next few years saw the introduction of a new airliner, the Boeing 747, which made air travel even more accessible and affordable.

General aviation also underwent a comparable boom in Victoria after the Second World War.<sup>21</sup> An airport for that purpose opened at Moorabbin in 1949, which remains as the state's principal centre for private flying, charter operations and pilot training. Civilian airports in regional centres began to appear from the early 1950s. Some, such as those at Bendigo and Ballarat (both early 1960s) were developed on the sites of former military bases while others such as Lilydale (1968) were purpose-built from scratch. The new architect-designed terminal that was built at Portland Airport in the early 1980s represented perhaps the first entirely new purpose-built airport terminal in Victoria for over a decade.

From the 1980s, commercial aviation in Victoria (as in Australia in general) underwent radical changes. In 1986, government airline TAA re-branded itself as Australian Airlines and, the following year, arch rival Ansett commenced international service. A massive pilot's strike in 1989 hastened the end of the Two Airline Policy that the government had maintained for several decades, and the first low-cost airline, Compass, was launched in 1990. Two years later, Australian Airlines merged with QANTAS, while Ansett thrived until a sudden and untimely demise during 2001. The introduction of further low-cost airlines such as Virgin Blue (2000), Impulse (2000) and more recently Jetstar (2003) made air travel even more available to the average Victorian.

3.7 Linking Victorians by Rail

The Great Depression and the Second World War had curtailed spending on Victoria's railway network to the point that virtually no major works were undertaken between 1930 (when the electrification of suburban lines was completed) and 1948 (when a branch line opened to Alamein to serve a new Housing Commission estate being developed there). The following year, the government engaged Sir John Elliot – then Chief Regional Officer of the British Railways Southern Region – to review the state's railway system. His report commended favourably on many aspects but recommended “a very considerable programme of rehabilitation and re-equipment”. In 1950, a ten-year and £80 million programme of upgrades was launched under the name Operation Phoenix, to include such things as:

- The purchase of new locomotives, carriages and other vehicles;
- The rebuilding and/or duplication of existing railway lines;
- The replacement of timber bridges;
- The updating of railway workshops and depots;

From 1956, the old “Red Rattler” carriages on suburban lines were replaced by new blue-painted Harris trains.<sup>22</sup> Several pre-war suburban stations were rebuilt, and some entirely new ones created. The latter included two stations specially built for factory employees – Mobiltown Station on the Werribee line at Altona (1953) and General Motors Station on the Pakenham Line at Dandenong (1956). Operation Phoenix also saw the introduction of diesel trains on country routes, along with buffet and sleeper cars to accommodate increasing rail-based tourism.<sup>23</sup> Such was the increase in this trade that Victorian Railways – responsible for promoting state tourism since the 1880s – transferred this role to a separate entity, the Victorian Government Tourist Bureau, in 1959.

A notable project during Operation Phoenix was the upgrading of the suburban interchange station at Richmond (1958-60), including a new two-storey building, overpasses and extra platforms to facilitate express services.<sup>24</sup> The project, however, was soon eclipsed by the new regional terminal at Spencer Street (1960-62), completed to coincide with the new standard gauge railway from Sydney. Both new stations were also designed to accommodate what would be Victorian Railways’ most ambitious project – the underground rail loop. Mooted as early as 1929, several schemes were considered before the final version – with three underground stations – was approved in 1958.<sup>25</sup> However, over a decade passed before the first sod was turned in 1971 and another before the opening of the new station at Museum (1981), followed by those at Parliament (1983) and Flagstaff (1985).<sup>26</sup>

3.7 Establishing and maintaining communications

During the war, restrictions were placed on many goods and services, and Victoria’s communication system was no exception. Restrictions had been placed on the provision of telephone services in 1942. As one source has succinctly noted,

On the cessation of hostilities, the Postmaster General’s Department faced many problems. With only a skeleton staff of trained personnel, suspended services had to be re-introduced; much of the existing equipment needed modernising; and new equipment was needed to meet the demand for new services which had built up during the war years.<sup>27</sup>

Redemption work, however, proceeded swiftly. Construction of a new central telephone exchange in Russell Street commenced in 1948 – the first major building to be erected in the city since the war – and was followed by others in St Kilda (1949), Strathmore (1952), South Yarra (1958) and elsewhere. The Commonwealth Department of Works was also responsible for the design and construction of new post offices, although the services of private architects, such as Don Hendry Fulton (eg Glen Waverley) or Abe Weinstock (eg Yarrowonga) were sometimes engaged. This period of expansion also witnessed the introduction of new technology that provided successive improvements to the state’s postal and telephone network:

- 1950: Mobile radio-telephone service;
- 1954: Telex (teleprinter exchange) service;
- 1959: Automatic Teleprinter Reperforator Switching System (TRESS);
- 1960: Subscriber Trunk Dialling (STD);
- 1962: Automatic postal station established in Melbourne – the first in Australia;
- 1964: Melbourne Mail Exchange opens in Spencer Street;
- 1966: Automatic Telex;

By far the most significant development in communications technology at this time was the introduction of television transmission in 1956. Melburnians embraced this with particular fervour, with five percent of households having a TV set compared to only one percent in Sydney.<sup>28</sup> Melbourne's two commercial TV networks occupied premises in old factory buildings in Dorcas Street, South Melbourne (HSV7) and Bendigo Street, Richmond (GTV9). In 1960, the former established, in a converted cinema in Fitzroy, what was then described as the first fully remote TV studio in the southern hemisphere. The first entirely purpose-built studio, occupied by government network ABV2, opened at Elsternwick on 21 May 1958.

Transmission to regional areas began in late 1961, with new stations established at Bendigo (BCV8), Shepparton (GMV6) and Traralgon (GLV10), and, later, a metropolitan relay facility at Surrey Hills (1963). When Melbourne's third – and last – commercial TV network (ATV0) commenced two years later, it was housed in an even grander state-of-the-art complex on a ten-acre site at Nunawading. The building even won an architectural award.

5.0 Building Victoria's industries and workforce

5.2 Developing a Manufacturing Capacity

A book published by the Australian Publicity Council in the late 1950s stated that “while Victoria is agriculturally the most highly developed state in Australia, its industrial growth, particularly in the post-war years, is probably its most outstanding achievement”.<sup>29</sup> With 16,000 factories employing over 350,000 people, Victoria in fact led the nation in certain industries:

- Automotive. Victoria became the centre for local car manufacture when the first Australian-made Holden rolled off the assembly line at Fisherman's Bend in 1948. The pre-war factory at that site duly expanded, while an entirely new factory opened at Dandenong in 1954, followed by a proving ground at Lang Lang in 1957. Competitors followed suit, with the respective factories of Ford at Broadmeadows (1956) and Volkswagen at Westall (1959).
- Food and Beverage. The Tongala milk processing factory (1949) was one of the first major factory complexes to be built in Victoria after the War. Amongst the “household name” food manufacturers subsequently established in this state were those of H J Heinz & Company at Dandenong (1954), ETA/Nut foods at Braybrook (1956) and Kraft Foods in Port Melbourne (1957).
- Petrochemical. Australia's first oil refinery was established at Altona in 1949 by the Standard/Vacuum Oil Company (later Mobil). This was followed by the refineries of Shell at Geelong (1953) and British Petroleum (BP) at Crib Point on Westernport Bay (1950s).<sup>30</sup>
- Building Materials. The post-war building boom saw factories established by STEGBAR windows (1953), Pilkington Brothers at Geelong (1954), Taubmans Paints at Sunshine (1956), BALM Paints at Clayton (1957), ACI Fibreglass at Dandenong (1959) and Stramit building board at Bendigo (1960).
- Tobacco Products. A huge tobacco factory was established at Bentleigh in 1956 by a consortium of British and Australian manufacturers, while their chief competitor, Rothmans/Pall Mall, subsequently established (at Tottenham) what was described as the largest tobacco factory in Australia.

While many of Melbourne's traditional pre-war industrial suburbs (eg Port Melbourne, Sunshine, Brunswick, Coburg and Richmond) continued to develop as such in post-war era, the period was otherwise characterised by decentralisation – a trend encouraged by the state government and facilitated by the state's expanding road and railway network.<sup>31</sup> Factories appeared in underdeveloped semi-rural areas on the fringes of the metropolis, such as Thomastown to the north, Braybrook to the west, Bayswater to the east, Cheltenham to the south and Clayton to the south-east. Industry spread even further afield, as was reported in Spotlight on Australia in the mid-1950s:

Melbourne itself, and the principal provincial cities of Geelong, Ballarat, Bendigo and Dandenong, all contribute to the state's title as the "workshop of Australia".<sup>32</sup>

Once described as "Australia's boom town", Dandenong was Victoria's first important centre for decentralised industry. The opening of a textile mill in 1949 was followed by a celebrated row of factories along Princes Highway for International Harvester (1951), H J Heinz (1954) and GMH (1956). By the end of the decade, it could be reported that

Decentralisation of industrial has been particularly vigorous in Victoria, and apart from large canneries at Shepparton and Kyabram in the Goulburn Valley, industries had also been established at Seymour, Rushworth, Tatura, Kilmore and Mooroopna. Geelong is the biggest industrial area outside Melbourne, and there has also been substantial industrial growth at Bendigo, Ballarat, Dandenong, Maryborough Wangaratta, Warrnambool and Castlemaine.<sup>33</sup>

5.4 Marketing & Retailing

Before the War, most Victorians still lived within walking distance of a traditional corner shop or suburban strip, with more specialised retail outlets available in larger regional precincts (such as Chapel Street in Prahran, Smith Street in Collingwood and Sydney Road in Brunswick) or in the city itself. Rising car ownership in the post war period, however, made access to these centres difficult.

- The early 1950s saw city retailers struggling to attract consumers from the suburbs. In 1953, Myer Ltd erected (in Lonsdale Street) what was then the first multi-storey carpark to be built since the War. Another one, the Grand Central Carpark, opened in Bourke Street soon afterwards.<sup>34</sup>
- The mid-1950s saw new suburban strip shop developments being provided with off-street parking. The antecedents for these was revealed by the Herald architectural critic when he noted that a typical example – a car-friendly block of shops in South Road, Moorabbin (1954) – "follows a Southern California pattern".<sup>35</sup>
- The late 1950s saw the ultimate solution in the form of another American type – the carefully-planned drive-in regional shopping centre. The first such centre in Australia had opened in Brisbane in 1957, but, as Peter Spearrit has noted, counterparts in Melbourne were delayed by the competing interests of local councils.<sup>36</sup> Consequently, it was the Housing Commission of Victoria that built the state's first modern drive-in shopping centre, unveiled at Heidelberg in 1957 as part of the adaptation of the former Olympic Village into a housing estate.<sup>37</sup> The following year, a similar centre on the slightly different "neighbourhood centre" model opened at Mentone. Then in 1960, the state's first true American-style regional shopping centre opened at Chadstone, which, with parking for 2,500 cars, was the largest centre in Australia at the time.

A parallel development with lasting repercussions was the introduction of self-service grocery shopping. This was largely pioneered in Victoria by chain retailer J C Dickins & Company, which had established fifty self-service centres across the state by the mid-1950s.<sup>38</sup> Towards the end of that decade, the company was acquired by rival G J Coles, which subsequently opened what was described as "Melbourne's first free-standing supermarket" in Balwyn North in 1960. A boom of new Coles "New World" supermarkets ensued, as well as counterparts by competing firms – the first Safeway Supermarket, for example, opening at Forest Hill in 1964.<sup>39</sup>

Both the drive-in shopping centre and the self-service supermarket had become ubiquitous in Victoria by the end of the 1960s, but further developments were yet to come in the form of American-style chain stores. The first K-mart store opened at Burwood East in 1969, followed by the first Target store (in Keilor Road, Essendon North) a year later. The American fast-food chains – with their readily identifiable programmatic architectural forms – also appeared during this time: the first Kentucky Fried Chicken outlet (on Nepean Highway, Highett) in 1969, the first Pizza Hut (in Maroondah Highway, Ringwood) in 1971 and the first McDonalds (in Ferntree Gully Road, Glen Waverley) in 1973. Some of these imported franchises, such as Henny Penny, Beef Ranch and The Red Barn (which had seven outlets by 1972) did not achieve lasting success and have faded into obscurity. Only the re-branded KFC and McDonalds survive today. The latter, in particular, has shrewdly adapted to changes in consumer requirements by introducing several innovations – often pioneered in Victoria. Melbourne, for example, has seen the first McDonalds outlet in a hospital, the first in a service station, the first in an Australian airport, and, in 1994, the world's first McCafe.

By the mid-1970s, the regional shopping centre – with grocery, chain and speciality stores, fast food outlets, cinemas and other facilities – was common in Victoria, characterised as “the community centres of the suburbs”.<sup>40</sup> Since that time, there have been few fundamental changes in retailing comparable to those made in the 1950s and '60s. As Kim Humphrey has noted, the later 1970s have seen consumers more concerned with convenience rather than low price.<sup>41</sup> Melbourne's first convenience store – and indeed the first in Australia – was a 7-Eleven outlet that opened at Oakleigh in 1977. The franchise duly spread to Sydney (1981) and Brisbane (1982) and subsequently, along with countless imitators such as Food Plus and Majik Market, proliferated throughout Australia. There were twenty 7-Eleven stores in Victoria in 1980, and 83 by 1987. The chain's first CBD outlet opened in Melbourne in 1996. In an attempt to compete, conventional supermarkets introduced extended opening hours and, by the late 1990s, full 24-hour operation. The act of shopping itself has also been streamlined by the introduction of bar codes and optical scanning (1982) and EFTPOS (1984).

5.5 Banking and Finance

One of the most significant changes in post-war banking in Australia was the creation of the new Reserve Bank of Australia in 1959, replacing the central bank known as the Commonwealth Bank of Australia. The legislation that led to this change, the Banking Act 1947, also required the nationalisation of all private trading banks, which, in turn, saw many private banks enter the savings bank field. The first three private banks established savings bank subsidiaries in Victoria in 1956, and virtually all others had done so by 1962. All this competition prompted the government-run State Savings Bank of Victoria to expand its facilities so that its scope of operations compared to that of the trading banks.

Not only did the number of bank branches in Victoria increase exponentially from the early 1950s, but the buildings themselves were transformed from their pre-war form. In 1955, Architecture & Arts reported that “the step from the old to the new has been most pronounced over the past two years”, noting that high windows and security screens had been replaced by larger windows or even entire walls of glass. It was further observed that

The outward changes in appearance are due not only to the fact that some banks wish to fall in line with modern architectural trends, but are also an outward reflection of the new relationship between Bank and Community.<sup>42</sup>

Banks began to move away from a pre-war tendency toward standardised design. While some banks continued to maintain their own architectural departments, others turned to prominent architects of the day. The ANZ Bank variously engaged Winston Hall, Harry Norris, Leslie Perrott or Leith & Bartlett while the State Savings Bank sometimes used Meldrum & Partners or Montgomery, King & Trengove.

41 K Humphrey, Shelf Life: Supermarkets and the Changing Culture of Consumption, p 148.

42 “The new banks have a new look”, Architecture & Arts, August 1955, p 27

However, the ever-expanding English, Scottish & Australian Bank (ES&A) was the leading patron of modern bank architecture during this period. Although the bank had appointed the brilliant Stuart McIntosh as its Chief Architect for Victoria in 1954, it is also known to have engaged the services of many others including Geoffrey Danne (c.1954), Chancellor & Patrick (c.1957-60), Montgomery King & Trengove (c.1957-70), Peter McIntyre (c.1967) and Daryl Jackson/Evan Walker (c.1969-70).

Bank amalgamation – a recurring theme in Australia since the 1890s – has become even more pronounced in the post-war era. The ANZ was formed in 1951 when the Union Bank merged with the Bank of Australasia, and would itself take over the ES&A Bank in 1970. This trend continued intermittently over the next two decades. In 1982, the Commercial Bank of Australia merged with the Sydney-based Bank of New South Wales to create Westpac. Eight years later, new legislation allowed the State Savings Bank to be absorbed into the Commonwealth Bank. An outcome of this merging was the consolidation of facilities and, consequently, the closure and disposal of bank branches that were no longer required. The introduction of Automatic Teller Machines in the early 1980s also changed the way Victorians did their banking, and many branches underwent remodelling and re-configuration.<sup>43</sup>

5.6 Entertaining and Socialising

As J M Freeland has noted in his fine history of the Australian pub, the post-war period brought with it an increase in beer drinking, but few changes – at least initially – in hotel architecture. He cites examples such as the new Graham Hotel in Swanston Street, designed by Best Overend in 1954, as a building that was “still fundamentally tied to the past”.<sup>44</sup> Freeland cites the year 1955 as the “year of revolution” in pub design, which saw the introduction of the drive-in bottle shop (which he claims as an Australian invention), the beer garden and the first motel.<sup>45</sup> Such developments brought about a new respectability to drinking in pubs. The buildings themselves became more open, with large windows, and tended to occupy larger sites with generous car parks. Segregated drinking areas (such as the old public and private bars) were gradually eliminated.

In New South Wales, these new developments were spurred by the end of six o’clock closing – a strange phenomenon that had stifled pub culture since its introduction in Australia’s southern states in the early twentieth century. However, Victorians had to wait another decade before the same restrictions were lifted 1965. Needless to say, this prompted a belated boom in the construction of new hotels throughout the state, with specialist hotel architectural firm of Jorgenson & Hough largely cornering the local market.

While the “traditional” pub remained the principal focus in the social lives of many Victorians in the 1950s and 60s, that period also saw the parallel development of venues for social interaction amongst minorities and sub-cultures. Clubs, cafes and other haunts associated with various ethnic and national groups have already been mentioned in the context of post-war migration. Some of these places (such as the Mirka Café in Exhibition Street, established by Mirka Mora in 1954) began to attract locals as well, developing into haunts for artistic and theatrical types. Barry Humphries, a self-confessed former Beatnik, writes in his memoirs of the many dimly-lit and smoky coffee lounges where he and his artistic friends congregated during the early 1950s.<sup>46</sup>

Various other local manifestations of post-war youth sub-culture would have had their own preferred venues for social interaction, from the bodgies and widgeys of the 1950s, the mods, sharpies and hippies of the 1960s and the punks and disco patrons of the 1970s. The last named, probably one of the most popular and visible socially-oriented sub-cultures of the post-war era, is also the best documented, and one of which some physical evidence may still survive today. The disco scene in Australia began with the opening of a club in Sydney’s Oxford Street in 1973; it promptly spread to Melbourne, where the leading venues included Lazar’s in King Street (1974) and the Love Machine in South Yarra (1975).<sup>47</sup>

Less well documented, but worthy of note, are the social venues associated with Melbourne's gay community, which have undergone ever-increasing visibility in the second half of the twentieth century. One of the city's first gay-friendly venues was the mysterious and elusive Val's Coffee Lounge, located at the top of a steep flight of stairs in Swanston Street, which provided a haven for artistic and theatrical types from the early 1950s.<sup>48</sup> While there were a number of contemporaneous establishments in the St Kilda area (such as The Galleon, El Sombrero, and the Prince of Wales Hotel), local gay clubs were not otherwise formalised until the 1970s.<sup>49</sup> Melbourne's first drag club, Trish's Coffee Lounge in North Melbourne, opened in 1972, followed a few years later by Pokey's nightclub at St Kilda. The Laird Hotel in Abbotsford re-opened in 1980 as a male-only venue, and today claims to be the oldest continually operating gay bar in Australia, and one of the oldest in the world.

5.7 Working

The years following the Second World War saw masses of returned service personnel brought back into Victoria's workforce, while many businesses whose activities had been neglected or curtailed were now free to flourish and expand. Both factors combined to create an unprecedented demand for office space in central Melbourne. The immediate response was decentralisation. Many long-established city firms were obliged to sell up and move elsewhere. The inner suburbs of East Melbourne, South Melbourne, North Melbourne and Carlton underwent considerable commercial expansion during this period. When the British Automatic Telephone Company built new premises in Bouverie Street, Carlton in 1953, it was reported to be the first new office building in the City of Melbourne since the War. Larger offices buildings began to proliferate on the city's edge, such as Chelsea House in North Melbourne (Harry Ernest, 1955) and Ampol House in Parkville (Bernard Evans, 1955).

Amongst those businesses moving beyond the CBD were some prominent architectural firms, such as Bates, Smart & McCutcheon (to St Kilda Road), Eggleston McDonald (to Carlton) and Harry Norris (to East Melbourne). When Ernest Fooks moved into a building of his own design in St Kilda in early 1956, it was noted that the premises "emphasises two new trends worthy of mention... the strangulation of the 'Collins Street Professional' and the invasion of areas in East Melbourne, Jolimont, Carlton, South Yarra and along St Kilda Road... and that of the architect designing and building his own offices".<sup>50</sup> Few others, however, followed Fooks' lead in regard to the latter, with most architects continuing to occupy existing buildings. Amongst those few firms that designed and built their own offices on the city fringe, were Garnet Alsop in South Yarra (1958), Eggleston, McDonald & Secomb in Carlton (1965), and Yuncken Freeman in West Melbourne (1970).

It was St Kilda Road – where Bates Smart McCutcheon built their new offices in 1957 – that would become Melbourne's most prominent example of decentralised commercial activity. The removal of a restriction on office buildings in 1957 saw the boulevard subsequently transformed into a business district of multi-storey office blocks. Similar development also spread along nearby Albert Street and Queens Road, and all three would remain as significant commercial precincts well into the 1990s.

Meanwhile, commercial expansion in central Melbourne had been hampered by a height limit of 132 feet (41 metres) that had been enforced since 1916. Many 'height limit' office buildings had been erected in the inter-war period, and this continued after the war following the completion of the first post-war example, the new premises of H C Sleight Ltd in Queen Street (Bates, Smart & McCutcheon) in 1953. Some others followed, but it was not until the height limit was lifted in 1956 that commercial development boomed in the city.<sup>51</sup> As was later recorded in Architecture Australia, no fewer than thirty new multi-storey office buildings had been built in and around the CBD between 1955 and 1958 alone.

51 'Urban and Suburban Development', in Victorian Yearbook 1973: Centenary Edition, p 183.

The first city building to exceed the 132 feet limit – not coincidentally located just outside the CBD – was the 20-storey (81 metre) ICI House in Albert Street, East Melbourne (BSM, 1958). However, its status as Melbourne’s tallest building was soon usurped by the 26-storey (96 metre) Conzinc-Rio Tinto building in Collins Street (Bernard Evans, 1962), which retained the title until the end of the decade when it, in turn, was dwarfed by the 113-metre AMP Square development (1969). By that time, high-rise development had become de rigueur, and it was reported in 1973 that buildings of twenty or more storeys were then appearing in central Melbourne at a rate of about one per year.<sup>52</sup> The next two decades saw the title of Melbourne’s tallest building held fleetingly by a rapid succession of towers: Marland House in Bourke Street (1971, 121 metres), BHP House in William Street (1972, 152 metres), Optus House (1975, 153 metres), Nauru House in Collins Street (1977, 182 metres), the ANZ Bank Tower in Collins Place (1980, 185 metres) and then the Rialto Towers in Collins Street (1986, 251 metres).

A hankering for multi-storeyed office blocks spread to regional centres, albeit at a more modest scale. Geelong’s tallest office building, built for the Victoria Insurance Company in 1956, was erected in what was then described as “the rapidly developing commercial centre of Geelong”.<sup>53</sup>

6.3 Shaping the Suburbs

By the mid-twentieth century, most of Melbourne’s inner suburbs had entirely filled out. The pre-war trend for large Victorian mansion estates to be cleared for residential subdivision continued during the 1950s and ‘60s, and particularly in the more desirable suburbs of Toorak, Caulfield, Hawthorn and Kew. Tracts of inner suburban land also became available as a result of the closure or decentralisation of large institutions. The grounds of Melbourne’s Protestant Orphanage in Brighton, for example, were partly subdivided in the early 1960s before the Victorian building itself was finally razed in 1963. At the same time, however, a few substantial pockets of hitherto undeveloped land still remained relatively close to the city. The most significant of these were:

- Beaumaris – where a huge tract of bushland had been acquired by the Dunlop Rubber Company in the late 1930s as the proposed site for a huge factory complex and staff housing estate. This never eventuated, and the company gradually released the land for subdivision from the early 1950s.<sup>54</sup>
- Balwyn North – where land had failed to attract settlement due to a lack of public transport. After a proposal for a branch railway line was rejected in 1908, the land languished for decades. While the tram line was finally extended to Doncaster Road in 1938, further residential development was hampered by wartime restrictions, and the area did not begin to fill out until the early 1950s.<sup>55</sup>
- Kew – those parts of this suburb along the river began to develop when riverside land, located on a flood easement defined by the Melbourne floods of 1934, were finally released for sale after the War.

All three of these areas attracted considerable interest not only from regular homebuilders but also from up-and-coming architects, many of whom subsequently erected houses for themselves there. All three areas were subsequently acknowledged as showplaces of cutting-edge contemporary architecture.

The average homebuilder, however, was obliged to look further out, to the rural and semi-rural fringes of the metropolis, when considering a place to build. From the 1960s, residential expansion in Melbourne was concentrated on the outer eastern suburbs, notably Waverley, Doncaster, Templestowe, Knox and Nunawading.<sup>56</sup> During that period, substantial inroads were also made into the city’s underdeveloped north (eg Keilor, Airport West and Avondale Heights) and south (eg Springvale).

56 “Urban and Suburban Development”, in Victorian Year Book 1973: Centenary Edition, p 183.

A recurring theme in the shaping of Melbourne's outer suburbs has been project housing. While a number of speculative house-building companies existed in the pre-war period (most notably that founded by A V Jennings in 1932), the origins of modern project housing in Victoria can be traced back to the Small Homes Service established in 1947 by the RVIA in conjunction with the Age newspaper. For just £5, prospective homeowners could obtain copies of plans and specifications for a two- or three-bedroom house in brick veneer or timber, designed (albeit anonymously) by some of Melbourne's new notable young architects. Although the service was available throughout Victoria, houses tend to be more commonly erected in particular suburbs. Philip Goad has noted an identifiable "belt" of Small Homes Service dwellings in the outer eastern and south-eastern suburbs, extending from Balwyn, Bulleen and Doncaster through to Beaumaris and Moorabbin.

However, project housing in Victoria would not flourish until restrictions on residential construction were finally lifted in the 1950s. The established firm of A V Jennings, which undertook mostly government contracts during the 1940s, became a public company in 1951 and, four years later, re-launched its private housing programme with a small estate at Spencer Street, Nunawading.<sup>57</sup> That year saw the formation of Victoria's first modern project housing company – Contemporary Homes Pty Ltd – which offered the so-called Peninsula House, designed by Robin Boyd. Although this met with little success, many other firms followed. The first modern project housing estate in Victoria – perhaps even the first in Australia – was the Futurama Village, an "American-style display village" that opened at Burwood East in early 1959. Within a decade, the local property market had been flooded by project housing companies. Some engaged the services of noted architects (eg Geoffrey Woodfall, Neil Clerehan and Peter Hooks), while the highly-regarded and groundbreaking Merchant Builders Pty Ltd – founded in 1965 – took an even more holistic approach, engaging interior and landscape consultants as well. In any case, it was project housing that defined the image of Melbourne's sprawling suburbia for decades to come. A V Jennings remained the acknowledged leader of the firm, creating numerous large suburban estates (eg Trentwood at Burwood, Karringal at Frankston, and countless others) that not only provided quality low-cost housing, but often associated community facilities such as shops, schools and kindergartens.

At the same time, some of Melbourne's well-established inner suburbs were being reshaped through a boom in apartment development. Certain areas that had been strongholds for flat construction during the inter-war period – notably the bayside suburbs of St Kilda and Elwood – continued as such, along with Caulfield, Malvern, Camberwell, Hawthorn and Prahran.<sup>58</sup> Many foreign-trained émigré architects in Melbourne, who were well accustomed to this type of living in Europe, specialised in apartment design. It was one such designer, the Viennese-born Kurt Popper, who, in 1966, designed the first modern block of residential flats to be built in central Melbourne since the War.

However, it was the Housing Commission of Victoria that most fundamentally transformed the inner suburbs through increased density living. The successive introduction of two, three and four storeyed concrete flats during the 1950s led, perhaps inevitably, to an ambitious high-rise apartment regime. After unveiling its first seventeen-storey apartment block in South Melbourne in 1960, the Commission went on to erect more than forty towers across its 21 estates in the metropolitan area, which culminated in the massive 35-storey Park Towers, also in South Melbourne, in 1970.

6.5 Making Regional Centres

The housing crisis of the immediate post-war period saw many people relocate to regional centres, where decentralised industry and other developments offered employment opportunities. Two notable government employers were the State Rivers & Water Supply Commission (SR&WSC), whose activities encouraged the development of towns along the Murray River, and the State Electricity Commission (SEC), which had a similar effect on the area around its coal mines and power stations in Gippsland, and its hydro-electric scheme at Kiewa.

- The SR&WSC not only provided estates of prefabricated housing for employees in existing towns such as Robinvale (1947), but also established some entirely new towns. The construction of the Eildon Weir in the early 1950s prompted the creation of a new township to accommodate construction workers, designed by architects Bates, Smart & McCutcheon in conjunction with Yuncken, Freeman Brothers, Griffins & Simpson (1957). Around the same time, the completion of the Hume Weir necessitated the relocation of an entire town so that a new reservoir could be formed. The new Tallangatta, established by the SR&WSC on a site several kilometres to the west, re-opened in 1956.
- The SEC coal mines and power stations in the Latrobe Valley similarly brought further settlement to existing centres such as Morwell and Moe. Following on from the success of its pre-war model city at Yallourn, the SEC established an entirely new township at Churchill (1967-71) to house its workers on the new Hazelwood Power Station. Ironically, Yallourn itself would be razed and cleared during the 1960s to allow the coal deposits below to be mined. The town's population was transferred to nearby centres of Moe, Traralgon and Morwell, which prompted further expansion of their respective residential and community facilities.
- The Housing Commission of Victoria also played a significant role in the expansion of regional centres. Spurred by the post-war housing shortage, it departed from its initial raison d'être – urban slum clearance – in order to provide new residential subdivisions in regional centres such as Swan Hill (1945), Wangaratta (1945), Kerang (1947), Drouin (1947) and elsewhere. The Commission's regional housing programme eventually embraced 130 estates in 120 regional centres. The largest of these was at Norlane, near Geelong, while others had fewer than ten houses.

6.7 Making Homes for Victorians

While the Second World War was followed by an unprecedented demand for housing in and around Melbourne, residential expansion was hampered by a shortage of materials and labour, and a size limit (1,250 square feet) in force since 1940. Until these restrictions were relaxed in the early 1950s, numerous attempts were made by government departments, organisations, companies and even individuals to solve the housing crisis:

- Prefabrication was seen as an ideal solution, although interesting local efforts such as the Romke house (1945), the Myer House (1945), the Indus House (1946) and the Beaufort steel house (1948) failed to gain widespread use, with only isolated examples (or a single prototype) built. The Housing Commission had far more success with factory-made concrete dwellings, based on a patent acquired in 1944. In regional areas, the Commission favoured prefabricated timber houses – some of local origin (eg Phelans of Maryborough) and others from Europe (eg at Norlane near Geelong). Another government department, Victorian Railways, ordered hundreds of English-made pre-cut timber houses to accommodate its migrant workers. But, as Miles Lewis has noted, prefabrication still managed to attract a stigma that “made it a dirty word in Victoria before the 1950s were out”.<sup>59</sup>
- New Materials and Methods were experimented with by prospective homebuilders avoiding restrictions on conventional materials. Pre-war interest in pise and mud brick (eg by A C McKnight and Justus Jorgenson) was revived from the mid-1940s by Alistair Knox and his circle in Melbourne's outer north-east. Young architects – often designing their own houses – tried not only mud brick but also concrete block, steel frames, strawboard panels and many other materials not previously exploited in residential design. Attempts were made – with varying degrees of success – to develop prototype construction systems based around the use of solid plaster (eg by Bernard Evans), bow-string trusses (by Peter McIntyre), sprayed concrete (the Ctesiphon system) and plywood (the Romcke house, qv);

59 Miles Lewis. The Portable Building, p 33.09.

- Increased density in residential living had been popular in Melbourne since the first flats were built in the 1910s. The post-war era saw these become larger and taller, with open plans, modern facilities and sunlit balconies. Frederick Romberg, who pioneered modern flats with Stanhill (1945-50), also designed the state's first block of "own-you-own" flats at Hawthorn (1949). The introduction of strata title legislation (by architect and Lord Mayor Bernard Evans) saw this type proliferate from the early 1950s – not least of all from Evans' own office. The same period saw the re-introduction of apartment types that were popular before the war, such as the bachelor flat, the villa unit and the co-operative development. Flats became so popular that it was reported in 1956 that "more flats are being built in Victoria than in any other state in the Commonwealth".<sup>60</sup> The total number of flats doubled every year between 1957 and 1961, and had trebled by the end of that decade.<sup>61</sup>
- High Rise residential development was the inevitable outcome of an trend towards increased density living, although Melbourne architects failed to embrace this to the extent of their European or American counterparts. Early examples such as thirteen-storey Edgewater Towers on the St Kilda beach (Mordechai Benshemesh, 1959-60) and the twenty-storey Domain Park Towers in South Yarra (Grounds, Romberg & Boyd, 1960-62) became prominent landmarks on the city's edge. Subsequent developers, however, did not embark upon a battle for increasingly taller towers and, by the end of the decade, the state's largest apartment blocks were still just over twenty storeys, typified by examples at 99 Spring Street (Moore & Hammond, 1969) and 15 Collins Street (Kurt Popper, 1965)

The 1970s ushered in an era of residential living in Victoria. Revisions to the Strata Title Act towards the end of the previous decade allowed land to be attached to titles, which gave rise to new types of medium density living such as the townhouse and the cluster estate. The impact of this was such that in 1976, Howard Tanner could observe:

Is the individually designed house becoming less common? Many architects say so. In the major cities, and especially in Melbourne and Sydney, land is at a premium and the vacant allotment is a rarity.<sup>62</sup>

Elsewhere, Tanner noted that the 1970s had also seen the demise of the 'minimum house' that had been developed in previous decades, and a rejection of the notion 'pure art' house in favour of expression of sculptural form and a preoccupation with natural materials and finishes.

7.0 Governing Victorians

7.1 Developing institutions of self-government and democracy

Inextricably linked to the residential, commercial and industrial booms in outer suburbs and regional centres was a municipal boom as local councils struggled to cope with rapidly increasing populations and demands for services and infrastructure. Numerous councils on Melbourne's fringe were elevated to the status of cities from the mid-1940s, including Nunawading (1945), Sunshine (1951), Broadmeadows (1956), Altona (1957), Dandenong (1959) and Ringwood (1960). The next decade saw a comparable boom through regional Victoria, with the declaration of the Cities of Colac (1960), Maryborough (1961), Moe (1963), Traralgon (1964), Echuca, Swan Hill, Benalla and Castlemaine (all 1965).

Expansion on this scale was prompted by the passing of the Local Government Department Act 1958, which created a dedicated department to administer legislation relating to municipalities.<sup>63</sup> Some years earlier, in 1944, local councils had been given the power to regulate the use of lands within their municipal boundaries by means of the planning schemes.<sup>64</sup> Five years later, the MMBW was appointed to prepare a planning scheme for the entire Melbourne metropolitan area, although this would not be completed, approved and operative until 1968. The MMBW subsequently delegated some of its responsibilities to the individual councils in order to allow the planning schemes to be implemented.

Most municipalities expanded their facilities during the post-war period. The decade from the late 1950s to the late 1960s saw the construction of countless new municipal offices –within the metropolitan area (eg Cities of Altona, Brighton, Camberwell, Oakleigh, Sandringham and Nunawading), in the outer fringe (eg Shires of Sherbrooke) and in regional centres (eg Cities of Benalla, Swan Hill). Many councils also took the opportunity to establish new community facilities such as libraries, kindergartens, infant welfare centres, swimming pools – or even (as in the case of the City of Prahran) an architect-designed garbage incinerator. A recurring theme in regional centres was the establishment of municipal art galleries. This trend commenced in 1963, when a new gallery (designed by Douglas Alexandra) opened at Hamilton – later described as “the first public art gallery to be built in Australia in thirty years”.<sup>65</sup> It was soon followed by another at Shepparton, and subsequently by others elsewhere.

The engagement of prominent architectural firms by municipal councils was another manifestation of a new interest in contemporary architecture in the post-war period. Some councils retained the same architects to design a range of buildings within their boundaries, such as the Cities of Brighton (Oakley & Parkes), Sandringham (Bates, Smart & McCutcheon), South Melbourne (Roy Grounds) and St Kilda (Don Hendry Fulton). At one point, the City of Sandringham adopted a policy to engage only local architects (eg Seabrook & Fildes or David Godsell), while the City of Nunawading even held an architectural competition to obtain the best design for their new civic centre. This trend has continued to the present day, with many councils now possessing a range of fine architect-designed and often award-winning buildings for the use of their ratepayers.

7.2 Maintaining law and order

The state’s prison system has also undergone considerable reform during the post-war period. The Inspector-General of Prisons undertook an overseas study tour in 1950, and subsequently reported to Parliament “that the treatment of prisoners be rehabilitative rather than retributive”.<sup>66</sup> Outcomes of his recommendations included the replacement of the reformatory school at Castlemaine with a new training centre for young offenders, now the Malmsbury Youth Justice Centre. It also saw the establishment of what was Australia’s first prison entirely for women, which opened at Fairfield in 1956.

8.1 Maintaining Spiritual Life

Not only has the number of new churches in Victoria boomed in the post-war period, but the form of the churches themselves have been fundamentally transformed. Many of the Christian denominations underwent some form of liturgical reform during the 1950s and ‘60s that affect the planning and layout of churches. The most well-known of these was the impact of the Second Ecumenical Council of the Vatican (Vatican II), held in Rome between 1962 and 1965, but the Protestant churches underwent similar reforms. In Victoria, churches became more open-planned, with a tendency towards non-traditional plan forms – not merely as an influence of liturgical reform, but also due to a new interest in pure geometry among the emerging generation of architects. While some striking modern churches were still designed in the form of a rectilinear box (eg Christ Church at Mitcham by Ray Berg), others took on a variety of plan forms: square, diamond-shaped, curved, hexagonal (eg several by David Caldwell and Wystan Widdows) or even circular (eg Plymouth Gospel Hall at Camberwell by Reg Curtis, 1958)

Post-war immigration also had a significant impact on the development of spiritual life in Victoria. Melbourne’s Greek Orthodox community, for example, dated back as far as 1897, but its numbers remained small (largely based in a small purpose-built church in East Melbourne) until the 1950s. The Antiochan or Syrian Orthodox Church broke away as an offshoot group in 1931, but it was not until the 1950s that other manifestations of Orthodoxy appeared. These included the so-called canonical

Orthodox Churches of the Bulgarians, Rumanians, Russians and Serbians, as well as the non-canonical or autocephalous Orthodox Churches of the Macedonians, Free Serbians and Ukrainians.<sup>67</sup> These have erected churches throughout Victoria, invariably designed in a nostalgic eastern European style by an “honorary architect” within the congregation itself.

The influx of Jewish migrants from the 1940s saw the opening of many new synagogues around Melbourne – all, as Walter Phillips has noted, south of the Yarra River.<sup>68</sup> One of the city’s earliest post-war synagogues was built in Marriage Road, Brighton East in 1949; its subsequent extension in 1965-66, which virtually tripled its size, gives some indication of the impact of ongoing Jewish immigration. Liberal Judaism has also become increasingly popular since the city’s original Liberal congregation – the first in the Southern Hemisphere – was established in 1930. A synagogue erected in 1937 in Alma Road, St Kilda, was quickly outgrown, and new congregations were subsequently formed at Kew (1952) and Bentleigh (1953), with a new synagogue erected in Alma Road in 1958.<sup>69</sup>

Since the 1960s, increased migration from Asia and the Middle East has seen the appearance of non-Christian places of worship. Census figures indicate that the number of Victorian residents whose religious belief could be categorised as “Non-Christian: Other” (ie other than Jewish) almost trebled from 4,190 in 1966 to 12,156 in 1971.<sup>70</sup> Two Sikh temples were established in Melbourne in the early 1970s, followed by the first purpose-built Mosque (at Preston) in 1975, a Hindu temple at Carrum (early 1980s) and a Buddhist temple in Springvale (mid-1990s).

8.2 Educating People

For Victoria’s Education Department, the post-war period began on an optimistic note with W H Ellwood’s Report on Educational Reform and Development in Victoria (1945). While the author’s recommendations – which included the replacement of traditional desks with chairs and tables and the provision of standard equipment for sports and libraries – eventually came to fruition, the immediate situation was somewhat dire. The post-war accommodation crisis, which saw unprecedented demand for new houses and office space, was no less keenly felt by the Education Department. Numbers of primary school children had increased not simply due to immigration and rising birth rates, but also because the Department itself had, in 1946, lowered the age of school admission to five years. Since the War, there had also been a substantial increase in the number of students continuing their education into high school. A report commissioned in 1949 from A H Ramsay, former headmaster of Melbourne High School, estimated that local high school enrolments would increase by 20,000 students over the next decade. The Education Department promptly explored options to provide adequate accommodation in an era still hampered by wartime restrictions on labour and materials.

- New Teachers Colleges. With the increased number of students came an increased demand for qualified teaching staff. New teachers’ colleges were promptly established at Bendigo (1945), Ballarat (1946), Geelong (1950), Toorak (1951) and Burwood (1954).
- Prefabricated Buildings were seen as a fine solution. Ex-military huts were pressed into service as temporary classrooms, while imported buildings were also sourced. A single Musset-type hut was arrived from England in 1949 as a possible prototype (erected in the grounds of the Geelong Teachers’ College) but the Department instead opted for aluminium classrooms manufactured by the Bristol Corporation. Several hundred were then imported for use throughout the state.

This program was discontinued by the mid-1950s, when several local alternatives were developed. These included a prefabricated metal classroom designed by architect Hugh Peck (1954) and a new type of timber-framed classroom known as the LTC (Light Timber Construction). This was developed by the PWD and formed the basis for seventeen new schools established in the later 1950s.

70 Victorian Yearbook: 1973, p 793,

Portable classrooms were re-introduced to Victorian schools in 1961, this time in a ubiquitous form devised by local suppliers such as A V Jennings, which went on to manufacture more than one thousand units over the next decade.

- New School Types. In the late 1940s, Chief Architect of the PWD Percy Everett (then only a few years from retirement) developed a prototype for primary school design based on a repeating module of hexagonal classroom units. The first example, at Balwyn North (1949-50) was followed by others at Newlands, Darling East, Ashburton South and perhaps elsewhere.

Education in regional centres was transformed by the introduction of the consolidated school. The first example had opened at Maryville in 1944 (followed by others at Manangatang and Tongala) but it was not until 1948 that the first entirely purpose-built example was unveiled at Timboon. A comprehensive expansion program was subsequently launched, which saw no fewer than 32 consolidated schools in operation in Victoria by 1958 (when the program was discontinued).

Subsequent developments included the introduction of multi-storey high schools, which were considered ideal for restricted sites in the inner suburbs, and, at the other extreme, the remarkable and sprawling Type 800 High School. The prototype for this, based on a courtyard model with two hexagonal blocks at its centre, was erected in the Gippsland town of Maryvale in the late 1960s.

Victoria's non-government schools followed a different pattern of post-war expansion. Decentralisation was the recurring theme, where many long-established inner-suburban private schools relocated to larger sites on the outer eastern fringe. Tintern Girls' Grammar School, for examples, moved from Hawthorn to Ringwood (1953), Mount Scopus (Jewish) College from St Kilda Road to Burwood East (1954), and Presbyterian Ladies' College from East Melbourne to Burwood (1956). Many entirely new private schools subsequently established themselves in the same areas. These not only included many more denominational school, such as Luther College in Croydon (1958) and the Seventh Day Adventist Academy at Lilydale (1964), but also "alternative" schools such as the Rudolf Steiner School in Warranwood and the ERA (Education Reform Association) School at Donvale (both 1972). Closer to the city, the established private schools that remained on their original sites underwent considerable expansion from the 1950s, with new classrooms, libraries, assembly halls and other facilities that were invariably designed by noted architectural firms of the day such as Mockridge, Stahle & Mitchell.

University education also underwent radical transformation during the post war period. Huge numbers of ex- servicemen – many returning to study that had been interrupted by the War – placed a strain on Victoria's only university, the University of Melbourne. The addition of temporary huts at the Parkville campus, and the creation of a separate campus in a former military base at Mildura, provided only a short period of respite. Further expansion, however, was not possible until financial assistance from the Commonwealth arrived in 1958. The subsequent cycles of regular funding via the federal government's advisory body, the Australian Universities Commission, brought about an unprecedented transformation of Victoria's tertiary education during the 1960s. This period saw:

- The large-scale redevelopment of the University of Melbourne's Parkville campus with many new multi-storeyed teaching blocks, beginning with the Redmond Barry Building (1959-61);
- The establishment of several offshoot campuses of the University of Melbourne, including the veterinary research centres at Parkville (1959) and Werribee (1966) and the agricultural field station at Mount Derrimut (1962);
- New purpose-built premises for the Victorian College of Pharmacy at Royal Parade, Parkville (1960)
- The creation of the two entirely new university campuses: Monash University at Clayton (1961) and La Trobe University at Bundoora (1967);
- The rapid expansion of student accommodation. All of the existing residential colleges around the University of Melbourne extended during the 1960s, and several entirely new colleges were built including Whitley College (1962), St Hilda's College (1964) and St Mary's College (1965);

8.3 Providing Health and Welfare Services

A salutary effect of the Second World War was the advance of medical science, which had a profound impact on civilian health services. Even before the War ended, the Ministry of Health Act (1943) placed the responsibility for all health-related matters under one administration and ushered in a new era of public health. Outcomes included the establishment of branches for maternal and infant welfare, dental treatment of school children, and the diagnosis of tuberculosis, while the Cancer Institute Act (1948) allowed the creation of a specialist institution for radiotherapy treatment, the Peter McCallum Clinic.<sup>71</sup>

As Julie Willis notes, the years 1930-50 represented the greatest era of hospital construction in Australia, “when hospitals became an identifiable building type of their own and the design of which became the province of specialist architecture firms”.<sup>72</sup> The influence of the war – not only in terms of medical advances but also in the restriction to labour and materials – redefined modern hospitals in Victoria. A pre-war tendency for sunlit balconies was soon abandoned, while the introduction of antibiotics – which reduced the time patients needed to spend in hospitals – prompted revisions to ward designs and the provision of specialist laboratories. The Royal Melbourne Hospital, designed and built before the War but not opened to civilian until the late 1940s, was the first Victorian hospital to reflect this new thinking. Its architects, the noted firm of Stephenson & Turner, became leading specialists in the field of hospital design – not merely in Victoria but across the country and beyond, with Arthur Stephenson receiving the Gold Medal from the RIBA in 1954 to acknowledge his significant contribution to the field.

The 1950s and ‘60s saw the massive expansion of hospital infrastructure in Victoria. In the case of some long-established hospitals, such as the Austin at Heidelberg and the Alfred at Prahran, comprehensive post-war masterplans have all but obliterated their nineteenth or early twentieth century origins. The same period, however, saw many new hospitals erected from scratch, particularly in the hitherto underdeveloped outer suburbs and in regional centres. A rapid increase in medical specialisation since 1950 has also prompted the establishment of many smaller hospitals and specialist clinics.<sup>73</sup> General practices with extended hours were introduced in Victoria during the later 1980s. These were pioneered by Sydney-based Dr Geoffrey Edelsten, whose chain of Supercare Clinics spread into Victoria in 1976 with the opening of the first example in Springvale Road, Glen Waverley.

Parallel developments in the field of maternal and child health included the introduction of pre-natal services (1946) and, in the late 1940s and early ‘50s, the appointment of social workers, dietitians and child psychologists. Although the construction of new infant welfare centres in the inner suburbs had peaked in the later 1930s, the immediate post-war period saw them proliferate in the developing outer suburbs, where newly married couples had tended to settle. Developments in mental health services were also re-shaped in the post-war period with the creation of the Mental Hygiene Authority in 1952, which was empowered to re-assess existing facilities and establish new ones.

9.0 Shaping cultural and creative life

9.1 Participating in sport and recreation

The introduction of the Forty Hour Week in 1948 gave Victorians more leisure time than ever before, which prompted a boom in recreational activities.<sup>74</sup> This, when coupled with the influence of new technology, the motor car and American culture, brought about a fundamental change in the way Victorians spent their spare time. The post-war period saw the radical transformation of many traditional forms of recreation, and the emergence of many entirely new ones. Amongst the most noticeable transformations were:

- Cinemas, widely popular during the inter-war period, decreased in popularity with the introduction of television in 1956, which saw many former cinemas demolished or converted for other uses. Another blow to the traditional 'picture theatre' was the introduction of drive-in cinema, with the first example in Victoria – and Australia – opening at Burwood in 1954. By the late 1960s, there were twenty throughout the metropolitan area and others in Geelong, Dromana and regional Victoria. These, however, subsequently fell from popularity with the pull of colour television, home video and the cinema complex. Modern multiplex cinema complexes had first appeared in central Melbourne in the 1970s, with the first suburban example opening at Chadstone in 1987.<sup>75</sup>
- Art Galleries became popular again after the opening of a modern architect-designed example in the regional city of Hamilton in 1963, which was lauded at the time as “the first public art gallery to be built in Australia in thirty years”.<sup>76</sup> The long-awaited rehousing of the National Gallery of Victoria's collections in a new purpose-built building of striking modern form in St Kilda Road, designed in 1959 but not opened until 1968, was a significant milestone for the state's art lovers. During the 1970s and '80s, many more regional art galleries would be established throughout Victoria.
- Football Stadia. While the Melbourne Cricket Ground (MCG) has remained the focus for the state's football culture since the mid nineteenth century, its pre-war fabric has been virtually obliterated by a succession of post-war renovations, including extensive upgrading for the 1956 Olympic Games. From the late 1950s, there was a move to establish a new stadium in a decentralised location. A site was purchased in the rapidly-developing outer eastern suburb of Mulgrave in the belief that this would eventually become a regional centre. Construction of the stadium, known as Waverley Park, commenced in 1966 and was completed in 1970. It remained in use for three decades, when the AFL relocated it a new city location, the Colonial Stadium (now Telstra Dome) in the Docklands.
- Swimming Pools. Although recreational swimming had been popular in Victoria during the inter-war period, the publicity surrounding the Olympic games in 1956 prompted a renewed interest in the sport. During the later 1950s and 1960s, many new municipal swimming pools were built around Melbourne – not surprisingly, mostly located in the northern and eastern suburbs that were not close to the beach. Indoor swimming pools, often with gymnasias, squash courts and other features, also began to appear during the 1960s but became more common in the 1970s and '80s.
- Racecourses. In the early 1970s, it was noted that horse racing was then the most popular recreation sport in Victoria.<sup>77</sup> Melbourne's two flagship horse racing venues at Flemington (home of the Melbourne Cup) and Moonee Valley (home of the W S Cox Plate) both underwent considerable renovation during the post-war period, with new stands and other facilities. Horse racing events were also held at the new purpose-built racecourse, Sandown Park, which was erected at Springvale in the early 1960s. This also served (and continues to serve) as the state's major venue for motor racing. The Australian Grand Prix, which was first held at Albert Park in 1953 and then again in 1958, has since taken place annually at that venue from 1996.
- Ice skating rinks. This sport became increasingly popular in Australia following the opening of the first purpose-built Glaciarium in Adelaide in 1904. Melbourne's premier venue was the St Moritz Rink in St Kilda, which opened just before the war and remained popular until it was destroyed by fire in 1981. The intervening years also saw the opening of several new rinks in the outer suburbs: Iceland at Ringwood (1969), the Olympic at Oakleigh South (c.1971) and the Colosseum at Dandenong (c.1975). By the mid-1980s, another two Iceland rinks had been built at Dandenong and Footscray. Around that same time, a temporary ice skating rink was installed at the Sydney Myer Music Bowl for use during the winter months.

In addition, the post-war period has seen the introduction of many new types of recreational facilities, some of which have remained popular while others have since entirely disappeared:

- Bowling alleys in Australia opened in Adelaide (1959) and Sydney (1960) before the first Victorian example – in Glenferrie Road, Hawthorn – was unveiled by the American Machine Foundry (AMF) in 1961. This firm, together with several promptly-formed rival companies, went on to build many others throughout the metropolitan area (eg Coburg, Northcote, Box Hill Brighton, Ringwood) and in regional centres (Wangaratta, Bendigo, Ballarat, Warrnambool and Geelong).<sup>78</sup> By the end of the decade, the market had been flooded and many examples were closed down and adapted for other purposes. Indeed, no new bowling alleys would be built in Victoria until the 1980s.
- Roller skating rinks first appeared in Victoria in the early 1970s, with one in White Street, Mordialloc, and another in Geelong.<sup>79</sup> By the mid-1980s, there were over thirty in the metropolitan area alone, including “roller discos” at Ascot Vale, Dandenong, Mornington and Oakleigh South. The popularity of these has declined in more recent years, supplanted by open-air skate parks.
- Theatre Restaurants in Australia actually trace their origins back to Melbourne in the late 1950s, when George and Lorna Miller began staging melodramas in the Bowl Restaraunt in the basement of Capitol House in Swanston Street. When this closed due to local licensing laws, the Millers moved to Sydney and opened the country’s first true theatre restaurant in 1961. Its best-known Melbourne counterpart, Tiki & John’s Music Hall, opened in Exhibition street in 1965 and remained in operation for the next two decades.<sup>80</sup> The appearance of Dirty Dick’s in Queens Road (c.1974) ushered in a new era of themed establishments, which was characterised by such local institutions as Dracula’s (1980), Witches in Britches (1990) and Hunchbax (1995).

The popularity of live performances – not simply theatre restaurants but also legitimate theatre and live music – has also burgeoned since the 1950s. The Sydney Myer Music Bowl, completed in 1959, was the largest purpose-built outdoor performance venue in Australia at the time. Along with Festival Hall in West Melbourne (1956) and Dallas Brooks Hall in East Melbourne (1970), it was one of the city’s principal concert venues for several decades. Melbourne was indisputably the focus of Australia’s popular music scene in the 1960s, evidenced by the fact that several prominent interstate artists (such as the Masters’ Apprentices and Billy Thorpe) relocated here during that period.<sup>81</sup> This significance, however, is somewhat ephemeral in that it is not well demonstrated by built fabric that survives today. The city’s leading venues for live music during the 1960s, for example, were the local municipal halls that were transformed into nightclubs every Saturday night, often taking on suitably evocative names such as the Odd Mod Club (Kew), the Coloured Cave (Brighton) and Opus Uptown (St Kilda). Live music clubs also proliferated in the inner city, such as The Bowl in Degraives Street (reputedly modelled on the Cavern in Liverpool) and the Thumpin’ Tub in Little La Trobe Street, which opened in 1965 and later gained notoriety as a hub for hippie culture and the alternative music scene.<sup>82</sup>

Theatre underwent a comparable boom in Melbourne from the 1950s with the appearance of a number of innovative and influential fringe theatre companies. These included the Union Theatre Repertory Company at Melbourne University (1953), the Emerald Hill Theatre (1962), Betty Burstall’s La Mama Company (1967), the Australian Performing Group (1968) and Hoopla Productions (later to become the Playbox and later still the Malthouse) in 1976. While the long-established Melbourne Repertory Theatre Company erected a new theatre for itself in St Martin’s Lane, South Yarra, in 1956, the fringe theatre groups of the 1960s and 70s displayed a recurring tendency to inhabit converted factories. Since the 1980s, the number of new purpose-built theatre venues in Victoria – often developed by local councils for both amateur and professional productions – has increased substantially.

Outside Melbourne, the manifestation of post-war recreation that has had perhaps the most profound influence is the tourism and holiday-making boom. The increase in car ownership from the early 1950s saw the emergence of new tourist-oriented building types, most notably the motel. Victoria's first motel opened on the Princes Highway at Oakleigh in early 1957, followed later that same year by the first regional counterpart, the Mitchell Valley Motel at Bairnsdale. An early motel guide, published in 1959, listed three motels in the Melbourne metropolitan area (at Clayton, Parkville and St Kilda) and another seven in regional Victoria. By 1963, these totals had swollen to 21 and 122 respectively.<sup>83</sup> Motels developed in strips – most notably along Royal Parade and Queens Road, the major thoroughfares in and out of Melbourne. The principle epicentres for motels in regional Victoria were the major tourist cities and smaller towns than represents several hour's drive from Melbourne. A motel directory for 1967 reveals that there were then five motels in Warrnambool, six in Wangaratta, seven each in Ballarat, Geelong, Lakes Entrance and Shepparton, eight in Bendigo and an astounding eleven in Mildura.<sup>84</sup>

Road-based tourism also saw the appearance of distinctive roadside tourist attractions, which began modestly in the 1950s with such attractions such as the popular and endlessly photogenic 'shell houses' (the best known examples, sadly no longer extant, being at Ballarat and Phillip Island) and the chair lift at Arthur's Seat on the Mornington Peninsula, which commenced operation in 1960. Subsequent manifestations of this sub-theme include the following:

- Reconstructed 'heritage' townships trace their origin back to 1963, when the Pioneer Settlement – the first outdoor museum in Australia – opened at Swan Hill.<sup>85</sup> This was followed by the celebrated Sovereign Hill at Ballarat (1970), and subsequent imitators at Korumburra (1974), Warrnambool (1975) and elsewhere.
- Theme Parks, of which the first local example was probably the Caribbean Gardens in Scoresby. Based around a large artificial lake, this complex was originally established by an outboard motor company in the late 1960s for demonstrations of recreational boating, but soon expanded to include a miniature railway, chairlift, Japanese gardens and a small zoo. Attractions of this type peaked during the 1970s, as demonstrated by the remarkable Kryal Castle near Ballarat (1973), Gumbuya Park at Tynong (1978) and Wobbie's World at Nunawading (1978).
- Big Things, of the type more commonly associated with road trips through Queensland and New South Wales, began to appear in regional Victoria from the early 1980s. These include the Giant Worm at Bass (1983), the Big Koala near Stawell (1988) and the Big Woolbales at Hamilton (1989).<sup>86</sup>

9.3 Achieving distinction in the arts

The emergence of a new generation of architects (and other design professionals) has had a significant influence on Victoria's post-war built environment. When Brian Lewis was appointed as the University of Melbourne's first Professor of Architecture in 1946, he brought in some of the city's most eminent architects as lecturers and, until his retirement 25 years later, steered the course of architectural education in a new direction. A list of those architects who commenced practice from the late 1940s to the mid 1950s reads as a who's who of Australian modern architecture:

- 1948: Mockridge, Stahle & Mitchell; Muir & Shepherd
- 1950: Smith & Tracey; John & Phyllis Murphy; Neil Clerehan; Peter McIntyre;
- 1951: James Earle;
- 1952: Kevin Borland
- 1953: Grounds, Romberg & Boyd; Middleton & Talbot

- 1954: Chancellor & Patrick;
- 1955: McGlashan & Everist; Don Hendry Fulton; Geoffrey Woodfall

Around the same time, some of the city's established pre-war firms – such as Godfrey Spowers, Yuncken Freeman and A S & R A Eggleston – were similarly transformed by the admission of younger practitioners as older partners retired or died. As Architecture & Arts reported in 1961

While the post war period in Australia has not produced any local Leonardos, it has produced a whole generation of talented young architects particularly active in the field of domestic architecture. Although older architects like Sydney Ancher and Roy Grounds still continued building houses in the post war period their efforts were swamped by the younger men.<sup>87</sup>

This period also saw the rising profile of designers from associated fields, who had traditionally played a less fundamental role in the creation of architecture. Amongst those who commenced their professional practices in Melbourne during this key period included:

- Landscape designers such as Emily Gibson (1948), John Stevens (1952) and Gordon Ford (1954);
- Furniture designers such as Fred Lowen and Ernest Rodeck (who co-founded the FLER Company in 1946) and Grant Featherston (1950);
- Interior designers such as Bee Taplin (c.1950) and William Le Lievre (1956). The rise of this profession also saw the establishment of the Interior Designers Association of Australia, which was founded in 1948 by a group of students from the Melbourne Technical College.

This coincided with a burgeoning interest in modern design amongst laypeople. Several new Melbourne-based architectural journals commenced, including Cross Section (1952), Architecture & Arts (1952), Architecture Today (1958) and Foundations (1960). The Age newspaper re-introduced a weekly property column in 1947 (as part of the Small Homes Service), while the Herald followed suit towards the end of 1952. Robin Boyd's book The Australian Home, published that same year, was eagerly devoured by prospective homeowners, while countless others subscribed to the long-running Australian Home Beautiful or its two more recent rivals, the Australian House & Garden (from December 1948) and the Australian Home Maker (from July 1954).

The ultimate mark of distinction, however, was to receive an architectural award – something that had not existed in Victoria since the RVIA Street Architecture Medal was rendered defunct in 1942. An ambitious attempt to revive the award program saw the inaugural Victorian Architecture Medal presented to Roy Grounds in 1954. It did not, however, become an annual event and, although journals such as Architecture & Arts nominated their own award-winning buildings during the 1950s, it was not until 1963 that the Victorian chapter of the RAIA successfully re-introduced an annual program. The program was subsequently and regularly revised over the next three decades by the introduction of the Bronze Medal in 1968, the House of the Year award in 1972, and countless new categories into the 1970s and '80s.

9.4 Creating popular culture

Just as it has throughout the rest of the world, popular culture in Victoria has boomed since the War due to increasing media saturation and the rapidly shifting succession of fads, fashions and subcultures. Again, as has been the case elsewhere, local manifestations and awareness of popular culture tends to be at its most potent when it can be connected to the physical environment. Some notable sub-themes in popular culture in Victoria (and particularly in Melbourne) include:

- International Visitors. Melburnians (and Victorians in general) have traditionally felt – and not without reason – that they are far from “the rest of the world”, and especially the cultural hubs of Europe and North America. As such, the city has readily embraced international visitors with particular fervour. The level of hype surrounding one early example – a visit by Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh in 1948 – significantly foreshadowed to what was to come.

<sup>87</sup> Quoted in D Evans, “Modern in Melbourne” website. <http://users.tce.rmit.edu.au/E03159/ModMelb/mm2>

The former international airport at Essendon has been the backdrop for some particular noteworthy arrivals – most notably the Beatles, who arrived here for their Melbourne concerts in 1964. However, comparable adulation accompanied the fondly-remembered disembarkations of busty British actress Sabrina in 1958, and Texan crooner P J Proby in 1965.

The lamentably demolished Southern Cross Hotel in Exhibition Street will always be associated with its brief occupation by the Beatles in 1964, and the vast crowds that surrounded it. This milestone in Melbourne's pop cultural history subsequently recreated in a 1992 movie titled Secrets, filmed on location before the hotel was razed. Another local hotel, the former Old Melbourne in Flemington Road, retains similar associations with the phenomenal 1977 ABBA tour. Footage of screaming locals, and the colonial-style hotel that they surrounded, subsequently found its way into the bands' official tour film, ABBA: The Movie.

- Disgraced Celebrities. While the presence of a celebrity in Melbourne may trigger a memorable moment in local pop culture, this rises to new heights when the person in question somehow embarrasses himself or herself. Barry Humphries writes of a visit to Melbourne in the 1970s by author Gore Vidal, which ended with the latter making a jaw-dropping scene in a local Italian restaurant.<sup>88</sup> While Sydney claims the suicide of comedian Tony Hancock, Melburnians will recall that it was in their town that Hancock was booed off the stage at his last concert before he headed north. A similar reaction to Judy Garland's notorious concert at Festival Hall in 1964 made world headlines and, to this day, still remains enmeshed in the minds of those who were there – and some who weren't. Decades later, in the early 1990s, it was at Melbourne's Metro nightclub that touring British popster Betty Boo dropped her microphone in the middle of a song to reveal she was miming to a backing track – an event that also hit world headlines and prematurely ended her musical career.
- Cult Television. The increasing use of location filming for local television productions since the 1960s has seen eagle-eyed viewers claim profound connections with the built environment. One of the most celebrated early examples of this was the Russell Street Police Headquarters, fondly remembered by many as the setting for perennial cop show Homicide (1964-77). Other local series, such as Bluey (1976) also made use of extensive location work in inner Melbourne. However, it was not until the 1980s that recognisable icons began to develop in the suburban landscape – perhaps most notably in the form of the ordinary residential cul-de-sac that became "Ramsay Street" for the long-running soap Neighbours in 1985.<sup>89</sup> More recently, this trend has spilled into regional Victoria, with towns such as Minyip, Castlemaine and Barwon Heads being re-branded as the fictional settings of Coopers Crossing (The Flying Doctors), Mount Thomas (Blue Heelers) and Pearl Bay (Seachange).<sup>90</sup> Such is the potency of the established connection between viewer and location that genuine distress could be engendered, for example, by the demolition of the Sullivans house in Camberwell, or by the proposed replacements of the ocean pier and the Barwon River Bridge from Seachange.
- True Crime. Sites associated with notorious crime or criminals continue to evoke morbid fascination and, in some cases, official memorialisation. Particularly prominent examples, where even the street name has become synonymous with event, include the murders at Easey Street, Collingwood (1977), Hoddle Street, Abbotsford (1987) and Walsh Street South Yarra (1988). A simple terrace house in Dorritt Street, Carlton, retains associations as the site of the murder that led to the execution of Jean Lee, the last woman to be hanged in Victoria, in 1950.<sup>91</sup> By contrast, an otherwise conventional double-fronted brick veneer villa in the suburb of Blackburn has an international resonance as the place where celebrated British train robber Ronnie Biggs lived for several years, under a pseudonym, before he fled to South America in 1969.

91 J Cockington, History happened here, pp 111-113.

- Outcasts. The folkloric tradition of the local recluse and the haunted house has, perhaps surprisingly, survived into the post-war period. One of the most celebrated local examples was Margaret Clement, the “Lady of the Swamp” who lived for decades in a decrepit Victorian mansion in Tarwin Lower that was gradually engulfed by rising waters. Her mysterious disappearance in 1952 was one of the most perplexing (and still unsolved crimes) of the era. The potency of the tale has seen it recounted in a bestselling book by Robert Shears, while Margaret Clements herself had qualified for an entry in the Australian Dictionary of Biography. Less well known, but still compelling, was the story of war refugee Nick Libertz, who built a remarkable makeshift dwelling on the banks of the Maribyrnong River in the 1970s and became known as the “River Hermit”.

3.0 Places of Potential State Significance

3.1 Identification Methodology

In order to identify places of potential state significance, the consultants undertook a literature review, sought outside nominations, and used their own personal knowledge of post-war architecture in Victoria.

Literature Review

Needless to say, the budget for this project did not allow for a comprehensive review of all available literature concerned with Victoria's built environment in the second half of the twentieth century. Instead, an attempt was made to identify what were considered to be the most pertinent sources – that is, the most likely to reveal places of potential state significance. While more detail can be found in the bibliography at the end of the report, the following provides a brief overview of the types of primary and secondary sources that were consulted:

Primary Sources

In reviewing primary sources, much reliance was made on an as-yet unpublished computer index of post-war Australian architecture, which has been compiled by Simon Reeves since 2001. While this currently has over 18,000 entries, it is still far from exhaustive. Sources that are partially or entirely indexed in this database include the following:

- Local architectural journals such as Architecture Australia, Architecture Today, Architecture & Arts and student broadsheets such as Cross Section;
- Populist housing journals such as Australian Home Beautiful, Australian House & Garden and Australian Homemaker;
- Other trade-specific or product-specific journals produced by various manufacturers, such as Steel Profile or Wood World;
- The architectural or property columns of daily newspapers (notably the Age and Herald);
- Contemporary guidebooks, notably the Guide to Victorian Architecture that was published by the Royal Victorian Institute of Architects in 1956 for the benefit of Olympic games visitors;
- Contemporary books and monographs, such as Robin Boyd's 1963 booklet, The New Australian Architecture, which illustrated several Victorian buildings;

Secondary Sources

The past fifteen or twenty years has seen a huge increase in the number of publications that discuss, assess, analyse or otherwise document post-war architecture in Victoria (and Australia). There has been a boom in conference papers, monographs and exhibitions devoted to individual architects, groups of architects, or specific post-war building types or themes. The number of typological studies, heritage reviews and heritage gaps studies, which are now increasingly concerned with places of post-war vintage, has also burgeoned in recent years. Amongst the most useful secondary sources consulted during the course of this study were the following:

- Philip Goad's definitive architectural guidebook, Melbourne Architecture.
- Ray Tonkin's as-yet unpublished equivalent, "Regional Architecture"
- Doug Evans' "Modern in Melbourne" website (<http://users.tce.rmit.edu.au/E03159/ModMelb/mm2>);
- Monographs, exhibition catalogues and student theses on individual Melbourne architects and firms;
- Monographs on modern Australian architecture (which have increased in number since the 1970s)
- Published histories of private companies, government departments and other bodies that have played a significant role in the creation of Victoria's post-war built environment;

- Theses on specific themes in post-war Victorian architecture, most notably Phillip Goad's thesis on modern housing and Julie Willis' thesis on female architects;
- Typological studies of particular building types (eg swimming pools, town halls, court houses);
- Heritage studies commissioned by municipal councils;

Photographic Collections

One particularly valuable source was the unsurpassed collection of photographic slides, now held by the State Library of Victoria, that represents life work of indefatigable architectural photographer Peter Willé, who documented significant contemporary architecture in Victoria from 1954 until his death in 1971.

Other photographic holdings within the State Library's on-line picture collection, including images by photographers John Collins, Wolfgang Sievers and Lyle Fowler, were also useful.

Outside Nominations

Nominations for places of potential state significance were also sought from outside agencies. The following were consulted in this regard:

- The 20th Century Buildings Register compiled by the RAIA (Victorian chapter);
- The on-line register maintained by National Trust of Australia (Victoria);
- Heritage Overlay Schedules maintained by local councils. In many cases, these were found to more up-to-date than the most recent heritage studies, and included post-war places that had been assessed separately by heritage advisers and others;
- Local heritage advisers at municipal councils. At the start of the project, a form email was sent to the heritage advisers at every Victorian municipality that was known to employ one, which asked for nominations of post-war places that might be included in this study.

Personal Knowledge

All three members of the study team maintain a long-standing interest in post-war architecture. Consequently, a number of places were considered for inclusion based solely on personal knowledge of their existence.

3.2 Verification of Places

While this project was commissioned as a "desktop" study, with no allowance for fieldwork, it was still considered desirable to at least establish, if possible, whether a building was still standing and remained in an intact condition. This was achieved either by personal knowledge of a site, or by reference to current aerial photographs and street panoramas that are readily available through a proprietary mapping website. If a building was known to be demolished or much altered, it was removed from consideration. In certain cases where demolition was suspected but could not be confirmed, places were often given the benefit of the doubt and included in the study regardless.

3.3 Application of Criteria

In considering places for inclusion in this study, the standard criteria of the Victorian Heritage Council, as revised in August 2008, provided the backbone:

|                    |  |
|--------------------|--|
| Criterion A | Importance in the course, of pattern of Victoria's cultural history;                                    |
| Criterion B | Possession of uncommon, rare or endangered aspects of Victoria's cultural history;                      |
| Criterion C | Potential to yield information that will contribute to an understanding of Victoria's cultural history; |
| Criterion D | Importance in demonstrating the principal characteristics of a class of cultural places or objects;     |

- Criterion E* Importance in exhibiting particularly aesthetic characteristics;
- Criterion F* Importance in demonstrating a high degree of creative or technical achievement at a particular period;
- Criterion G* Strong or special associations with a particularly community of cultural group for social, cultural or spiritual reasons. This includes the significance of a place to Indigenous peoples as part of their continuing or developing cultural traditions;
- Criterion H* Special association with the life or works of a person, or group of persons, of importance in Victoria's history;

For this study, a number of sub-criteria have also been defined, which relate the Heritage Council's broad criteria to more specific manifestations and themes evident in Victoria's post-war heritage. These sub-criteria include the following:

Interstate Architects (HV Criterion B)

This refers to buildings or places that represent rare forays into Victoria by prominent architects or firms from interstate. Prior to the Second World War, architects rarely designed buildings outside their home state unless engaged in specialist work (eg hospital or factory designers) or commissioned by a particular firm to design its buildings in various centres (eg A & K Henderson's work for T&G Company). A few pre-war architects, such as Stephenson & Meldrum and Walter Burley Griffin, maintained offices in Sydney and Melbourne at the same time, while others such as Bernard Evans made brief forays to Perth. After the War, it became more common for architects to work across state borders. The post-war period not only saw Victorian firms such as Yuncken Freeman, Bates, Smart & McCutcheon and Grounds, Romberg & Boyd design buildings outside Victoria, but also interstate practitioners such as Harry Seidler, Allen & Jack, Don Gazzard, Peter Muller and Enrico Taglietti undertake work in Victoria.

A variation on this theme encapsulates those buildings in Victoria designed by architects who were born, educated and/or employed here, but who subsequently left and became far more well-known interstate. Such buildings may be overlooked simply because the names of their designers mean little to local researchers, despite the fact that their later careers might well be the subject of research, monographs and exhibitions outside Victoria. The few known buildings designed in Victoria by Arthur Baldwinson, Donald Crone, Neville Quarry and Morrice Shaw are of potentially state significance as rare and valuable records of the early work of architects who went on to far greater fame in New South Wales. The case of Esmond Dorney is particularly interesting in this regard: a Melburnian who moved to Tasmania after the War and became a noted and highly-regarded modernist, yet subsequently accepted a few commissions in Victoria during the 1950s and 60s.

International Architects (HV Criterion B, H)

In a similar vein, buildings designed by prominent internationally-based architects were considered as automatic candidates for inclusion, both on account of their rarity and their ability to demonstrate Victoria's architectural cross-pollination with the outside world. Again, this phenomenon was rare before the Second World War, with a few exceptions such as the respective involvements of British architect William Butterfield on St Paul's Cathedral (1890) and American architect John Eberson on the Forum Theatre (1928). After the war, some of Melbourne's larger firms began to foster connections with overseas firms such as Skidmore, Owings & Merrill and Welton Beckett & Associates, which led to a number of local projects being designed in association in the 1950s and 60s. A number of prominent overseas architects also visited Melbourne during that period – usually as special guests at conventions and so on – which was another indication of the city's rising profile in the international architectural scene. A celebrated visit by Walter Gropius in 1954 was followed by a string of others, including Le Corbusier's protégé Jullien de la Fuente (1965), Buckminster Fuller (1969), Elliot Noyes (1970), Giancarlo de Carlo (1971) and Bruce Goff (1979).

The number of notable international architects who have designed buildings in Melbourne has increased since the 1970s, with local projects by the likes of I M Pei, Johnson Burgee and Kisho Kurakawa, and more recently by Norman Foster and Philippe Starck.

Prototypes (HV Criterion B)

Potential historical and architectural significance at the state level can readily be ascribed to any building that represents the “first” example of its particular type or form in Victoria. This broad criterion could include such things as:

- The earliest or most intact surviving examples of new post-war building types (eg bowling alleys);
- The original premises of the chain stores and fast-food restaurants that subsequently became widespread (eg the first Target store in Niddrie or the first Kentucky Fried Chicken outlet in Highett);
- The first buildings ever designed by particularly notable architects or firms, especially where this can be perceived as the origin for architectural themes or forms that characterise their mature work;
- Prototypes of prefabricated houses (some of which may not have actually progressed beyond a single prototype building);
- Prototypes of new project housing dwellings that subsequently became widespread;

Prototypes of various manifestations of public housing (eg the first concrete slab walk-up flats, high-rise apartment blocks or low-rise townhouse developments built by the Housing Commission);

Exhibition Houses (HV Criterion B)

An interesting development in post-war residential architecture in Victoria was the construction of display houses by particular companies or organisations, which were intended as a demonstration of their products or services. Invariably architect-designed, these houses were opened to the public and usually generated much publicity from a generation that was obsessed with the latest developments in modern living. The post-war period saw exhibition dwellings constructed by newspapers and magazines (eg The Age Dream Home in Surrey Hills), product manufacturers (such as FLER furniture, James Hardie, Victor Plasterboard and Insulwool), and even government utility providers (eg State Electricity Commission and the Gas & Fuel Corporation). Others, such as the famous but temporary Heart's Desire House (Bernard Evans, 1959), which was built on the corner on Collins and Russell Streets, was erected solely as a fundraising exercise for the National Heart Foundation.

When the initial publicity died down, these exhibition houses often resumed a normal existence as a typical suburban dwelling. Consequently, few survivors have been conclusively identified and a number (including two in Blackburn designed by Neil Clerehan) are already known to have been demolished. Those rare survivors should be considered of outstanding architectural and historical significance as a barometer of tastes and expectations in the post-war era.

Female Architects (HV Criterion B)

Although women have been practicing architecture in Victoria since the 1910s, their numbers remained relatively small until the 1940s. The post-war period saw a number of Victoria's pioneer female architects (such as Ellison Harvie, Cynthia Teague and Ailsa Trundle) rise to unprecedented senior positions within their firms (or in Teague's case, government department). Consequently, there were some especially notable projects such as the Lyceum Club in Melbourne (1957) and St Hilda's College in Carlton (1964), which were designed entirely by female professionals. This period also saw a rising proliferation of husband-and-wife architectural firms such as John & Phyllis Murphy, Gerd & Renate Block, Winston & Elizabeth Hall, Geoffrey & Marcia Stott and others. While women have played a significant part in the creation of some award-winning buildings from the 1950s to the 1970s (eg Phyllis Murphy, Renate Block and Maggie Edmond), it was not until 1980 that the RAlA (Victorian Chapter) awarded its Bronze Medal to the work of female architect – an actor's studio designed by Suzanne Dance five years earlier.

Award Winners (HV Criterion F)

Buildings or places that were recipients of major architectural awards were considered worthy of automatic inclusion in this study. A major architectural award was defined as:

- The Victorian Architecture Medal, first awarded by the RAIA (Victorian chapter) as a one-off prize in 1954, and then again in 1963, before being formally re-introduced as an annual award in 1987;
- The Bronze Medal, first awarded by the RAIA (Victorian chapter) in 1968;
- The Age/RAIA House of the Year, awarded from 1972 to 1979;
- Major awards bestowed on Victorian buildings by the national RAIA, as opposed to the state chapter, such as the Robin Boyd Award for Housing and the Sir Zelman Cowan Award for Public Buildings;

Less weighting was given to places that received lesser awards, such as merit awards or commendations in the Victorian Architecture Awards, or specialist awards associated with the housing, product-specific or trade-specific industries. While many places that had won awards, of various kinds, were included in this study, places were not necessarily included just because they had won that award.

Best Victorian Houses (HV Criterion F)

At an early stage in this project, it was decided that any house that has been included in Neil Clerehan's 1961 book, Best Australian Houses, should qualify for automatic inclusion in this study. Clerehan's nationwide survey of cutting-edge residential architecture included no fewer than ten examples in Victoria. These are considered to be of architectural significance at the state level, for their ability to demonstrate what was considered, at that time, and by one of Australia's leading authorities on residential architecture, to be the best modern houses in the country. Sadly, at least three of the ten "best Victorian houses" are already known to have been demolished:

- Myer House (Pelican), Davey's Bay, Frankston South (Grounds, Romberg & Boyd, 1955-56);
- Raymond House (Blue Peter), 21 Gulls Way, Frankston South (Rae Featherstone, 1956);
- Samuel House, 65 Bay Street, Brighton (Geoffrey Woodfall, 1957)

Although two of the "best Victorian houses" have been classified by the National Trust (including the now-demolished Blue Peter), it was nevertheless surprising when preliminary research revealed that none of the seven survivors are currently protected by an individual heritage overlay.

Overseas Publication (HV Criterion F)

Buildings in Australia, by Australian architects, rarely featured in the overseas architectural press until after the Second World War. In July 1948, the London-based Architectural Review published its first special issue on recent Australian architecture, with contributions by Walter Bunning, Arthur Stephenson, Vance Palmer and expatriate Raymond McGrath, in which a number of Victorian examples were illustrated. Still more local buildings appeared in the subsequent issues of December 1948, November 1950, November 1951, November 1952, October 1959 and June 1968, illustrating recent work by Robin Boyd, Roy Grounds, Ernest Fooks, Neil Clerehan and John & Phyllis Murphy. Not to be outdone, the American Architectural Record published a review of recent Melbourne buildings in August 1952.

This trend has become far more common since the 1980s, with buildings in Victoria appearing in a range of highly-regarded European and Asian architectural journals, including Architecture & Urbanism (Japan) and Architecture d'aujourd'hui (France).

New Methods & Materials (HV Criterion F)

Mass production of wartime equipment led to new economies and new types of materials coming onto the market. Some of these were already in small scale production prior to the war but the need for all types of materials for building and war equipment expanded their potential and dramatically increased their use and market.

Amongst these were acrylics, aluminium, plywoods, rubber replacements, fibreboards, plastic laminates and gypsum products. The engineering profession also played a role in expanding how materials could be deployed. Reinforced concrete technology was overtaken by prestressed and post-stressed technologies, large scale laminated beam technology has led to lower scale laminated and glue technologies thereby becoming available in domestic construction and moulded plywoods found their way from navy gunboats into furniture production.

A case in point is Masonite also manufactured as Burnie Board in Australia. Fibreboard (ie a board of compressed wood pulp) had been made as early as 1885 although not to a satisfactory standard. Masonite however was an accidental product of the Mason Fibre Company (USA) of 1926 and a house of this material came to feature in the 1933 Century of Progress Exhibition in Chicago. It had limited sales but was subsequently used as a lining for Quonset huts during the Second World War making its use as a simple lining board known to Allied countries. It subsequently became a marketable, easily erected and economic wall board when war time building restrictions were lifted in Australia. Since then a number of other fibre boards have appeared such as Chipboard, Caneite and MDF (from the 1980s). Similarly decorative plastic laminates (a postwar spin off from increased chemical production and technologies) became available at the domestic level as Laminex. A myriad of other products such as Neoprene, Butyls, Spandrel Glass and Gypsum Boards also appeared in the years following the war.

Certain places were deemed to be potentially of technological significance at the state level if they represented early or innovative use of new building materials or construction methods that emerged or rose to prominence in the post-war period.<sup>92</sup> Such developments included:

- 1945: Laminated timber arches, first used in Victoria at the Burges Brothers premises in Flemington;
- 1952: Aluminium roofing, which made an early appearance in Eric Lyon's own house in Beaumaris;
- 1953: Metal-framed curtain walling; structural plaster;
- 1954: Pre-stressed concrete components first used in Victoria, in a private house in Balwyn North;
- 1962: Local production of sheet glass, after a period when it was manufactured in New South Wales and then "imported" into Victoria.
- 1960s: Developments in reinforced concrete including flat plate construction, lift slab construction, slip form construction, precast flooring and pre-tensioned or post-tensioned structural members.
- 1968: "Universal section" steelwork began to replace traditional rolled steel joists.
- 1970: tilt-up concrete slab construction, of which some of Australia's earliest examples (representing both structural and non-structural use of the material) appeared in Victoria.<sup>93</sup>

Architect's Own Buildings (HV Criteria B, F, H)

In his 1947 book Victorian Modern, Robin Boyd drew specific attention to the architect's own home as almost a discrete type, where the designer was unencumbered by the needs and desires of a paying client. The distinctive expression of the designer's own residence became even more pronounced during the housing boom of the 1950s, when bold experimentation in materials, forms and planning created some of the most distinctive houses ever built in Victoria. Architect's own houses are thus considered as an important sub-theme in the development of local modern architecture, and a perhaps surprising number of examples have been included to reflect this.

It is noted that an architect's own dwelling was not necessarily included in this study because it was the work of a particularly well-known practitioner. The homes of some lesser-known names were also included if they were of especial aesthetic or technological note in their own right, or if they represented a rare foray into private residential architecture by a designer who mostly worked in another field.

This sub-criterion also embraces office buildings that architects or firms have designed for their own use. The purpose-built architectural office is largely a post-war phenomenon in Victoria, with one of the earliest examples being that erected by Ernest Fooks in St Kilda in 1956. Relatively few others were built during the later 1950s and 1960s (eg by Bates, Smart & McCutcheon, Eaglemont McDonald & Secomb, and Yuncken Freeman). The type subsequently underwent resurgence from the 1980s, when members of a new generation of architects, such as Ivan Rijavec (1986) and Peter Crone (1990), designed and built professional offices for themselves,

Associations with 1956 Olympic Games (HV Criteria A, C, G)

The Games of the XVI Olympiad, which were held in Melbourne in November and December 1956, are acknowledged as one of the most significant historical events to occur in Victoria – not only at a state level, but also at a national and even international one. Although the event itself (and the buildings associated with it) has important historical and social associations, the lead-up to the games had far-reaching repercussions on the built environment. Following the announcement in 194 that Melbourne would host the games, there was a flurry to update the city's image and, as Barry Humphries has wryly noted, "half of Victorian Melbourne was torn down in the stampede to be modern".<sup>94</sup> Outcomes of this 'stampede' included the following:

- Upgrading of the city's principal transport hubs for sea and air travel;
- Construction of sports training venues, such as the Beaurepaire Centre at the University of Melbourne;
- Construction of new hotels in the CBD and throughout the metropolitan area;
- The development of the Olympic Village in Heidelberg and its associated community facilities;
- Whimsical Olympic-themed decorations installed in the city streets, and in key tourist arrival points at Station Pier and Essendon Airport;
- A proliferation of Olympic standard swimming pools that were subsequently erected throughout the suburbs (and, to a lesser extent, in regional centres) in the later 1950s and '60s;

3.4 Preparation of Citations

Components

For each of the places defined as being of potential state significance, a brief citation was prepared. This provided the following details:

- Name and former name (if applicable);
- Address and local government area;
- Designer (if applicable);
- Dates of construction and, where applicable, subsequent additions;
- Themes and sub-themes, as defined in the thematic overview;
- Keywords (see below);
- Nature of potential state significance (ie architectural, aesthetic, social, historical or technological), followed by a brief explanation if necessary;
- Group and category of the place (as defined by standard HV list – see Section 3.6 below);
- References;
- Image (if available);

<sup>94</sup> Barry Humphries, More Please, pp 150-151.

Keywords

Each citation provided for the inclusion of 'keywords' that represent either sub-criteria (as defined in the foregoing section 3.3) or other significant post-war sub-theme that might be demonstrated by that particular place. Some of the specific Keywords that have been used include:

- Decentralisation: as manifest by factories, schools and other developments relocating from the metropolitan area to the suburban fringe or regional centres
- Prefabrication: a recurring sub-theme in the development of housing, education, community facilities and other aspects of life in the immediate post-war period;
- American Culture: those buildings that show the pervasive influence of American culture and consumerism in the post-war period;

Intangible Heritage

During the course of this study, a special class of place was identified where historic associations of potential state significance might be contained within built fabric of earlier origin. This might refer, for example, to pre-war houses that were occupied by prominent figures with particular resonance to Victoria's post-war culture (eg Barry Humphries, Bob Hawke and Germaine Greer). It also encapsulated otherwise unremarkable buildings or shopfronts that were once occupied by celebrated but long-defunct bohemian haunts, live music venues and so on. The historic and social associations of such places may yet be of state significance, even if there is now little or even no surviving fabric associated with it. A small selection of these examples of "intangible heritage", which arguably fall outside the scope of this study of post-war built fabric, have been listed separately as Appendix B.

3.5 Omissions

The project brief specifically identified several classes of places that were not to be included in the present study, principally because they have been subject to separate assessment or dedicated typological studies. These places are identified as follows:

- Places that are either already included on the Victorian Heritage Register, or are currently being assessed for possible inclusion on the Victorian Heritage Register (see Appendix A)
- Cinemas (including drive-in cinemas);
- Motor garages and service stations;
- Churches and other places of worship within the Melbourne metropolitan area (as defined in 1996);
- Objects, collections and movable cultural heritage;
- Archaeological sites;

3.6 Limitations

The original brief for this project noted that, although it should cover the period from 1945 to 2000, the emphasis should be on the first thirty years. Arguably, it is more difficult to objectively assess the recent past, and to evaluate the work of architects who are currently practising. In evaluating post-1975 places for possible inclusion in the study, priority was given to those that met the following criteria, which were considered to constitute 'automatic' candidacy for potential state significance:

- Winners of major architectural awards (as defined in Section 3.3 above);
- Buildings designed by noted interstate and international architects;
- Buildings that were published internationally;

The limitation in regard to the literature review has already been discussed. As the present study did not include an exhaustive review of published sources, the places included therein should not be considered as a closed set into which no further correspondence need be entered. At an early stage in the project, it was determined to provide a broad overview of places that reflecting major themes and types. It is freely acknowledged that many more places of potential state significance will exist, and await identification in the future.

Reasonable attempts were made to provide accurate street addresses for all places in the study so that they can be readily located for future verification and assessment. Occasionally, an original source contained insufficient information relating to the location of a place, and often there was no further avenue (or perhaps only a convoluted and labour-intensive avenue) for verification. In a few cases, addresses have been cited without street numbers or, in a few rare cases, without street names.

3.7 Categorisation

The following citations have been arranged according to the standard list that has been adopted by Heritage Victoria, whereby places are first categorised according to a broad thematic type (referred to a group) and thence into a more specific sub type (referred to a category). With only a few exceptions, this taxonomy was found to be adequate for the often bewildering array of post-war places. Perhaps not surprisingly given the type of places that developed and proliferated in the second half of the twentieth century, not all of the groups included below are represented in the citations.

In the following report, citations have been arranged firstly by group, then by category, and then by date of construction. To assist in indexing and cross-referencing, each citation has been given a unique identification number, determined by its group (as listed above), simply followed by a three-digit sequential designation. The few code numbers that incorporate fractions (ie ½) represent last-minute additions to the study, which were inserted after the numerical sequence had been established.

Appendix B: Pre-War Places with Significant Post-War Associations

The following tables provide a selection of buildings of pre-war origin that have acquired significant associations during the post-war period. While little or indeed no physical evidence may remain to demonstrate these specific associations, the associations themselves are considered to be of potential state significance.

| A striking modernist curtain-walled building, influenced by libraries seen by the architect during an overseas tour in the late 1940s. Described by Philip Goad as "a Melbourne institution in its own right", this building was and still is one of the largest university libraries in Australia. |   | P Goad, Architecture on Campus , p 64   |                          |

| Significance Historical; aestheticAssociated with the mining of brown coal in Morwell from the late 1940s, this power station was mooted in 1959 and built in six stages between 1964 and 1971. It prompted the creation of an entire town, Churchill, to accommodate its workers. With its row of eight tall concrete chimneys, the power station remains a prominent landmark in the Latrobe Valley. |   | References                                     |                                    |
